The Easy Come Bar

he Easy Come bar wasn't the favorite spot of the thousands of Gis who took their R&R in Bangkok in 1969. Most Viet vets who spent time in Thailand will remember such places as the Hollywood, Thai Heaven, the Miami, the Green Dragon, and the California.

The Easy Come sat by itself, almost at the end of New Phetburi Road. For a GI bar in the R&R years, it was a small place, just a bar with six stools and four booths along one wall. I walked into the place one afternoon looking for possible spouts—the water taps of information in the business of foreign intelligence collection. I was working for one of a dozen different agencies in the alphabet soup of spies and diplomats that stalked the streets of Bangkok while was raged a few hundred miles to the east.

I sat in a booth, ordered a beer, and pretended for the moment that I didn't understand a word of Thai as three pretty girls slid into the booth with me, one beside me and two on the seat across from me. I fended off questions about where I was from and how many hours I had been in Bangkok while I slowly sipped a Singha beer. As the girls chattered on, I looked the place over while I listened to what they were telling each other whenever they spoke their own language.

I also took a good look at the Mamasan-the woman who managed the girls and took the money when a customer decided to buy a girl our for the evening. A rall, pretry Eurasian woman in her early thirties, the Mamesan sat behind the bar, watching wish dark brown eyes everything that happened around her.

The Mamasan caught me tooking as her and she smiled. I decided instantly that I was going to do my off-duty drinking in the Easy Come until I got to know her a whole lot better. I've always had a thing for smart, competent, strong, goodlooking women. I left the girls sitting in the booth and walked over to the bar, carrying my bottle of Singha. She looked up and focused on me as I asked her what her

THEO C. WAS.

"Connie, with no last name," she told me and went back to working on the account book

It took another four visits before she started talking enough to tell me her father had been a Dutchman who had lived in Thailand. He had taken Connie's Thai mother as his wife a few months before the Japanese captured and killed him during World War II. She had grown up poor and claimed she had opened the but with money won in the That fortery.

I told her that I was a bright many American sociologist working with the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) and was trying to discover how the Thai government could will the hearts and minds of its rural population before the Commies took over.

Maybe it was my suspicious nature, maybe it was because I was trying to learn everything possible about the spy business, but the many afternoons and evenings I sat in the Easy Come, sipping on a licer in a back booth and watching the parade of GIs on R&R and how well the girls handled them, the more what started as a tiny suspicion barring in the back of my mind became an open flame.

Counterintelligence wasn't my game in those days, so when I couldn't fight off the suspicion anymore. I took a lieutenant colonel westing in Military Assistance Command, Thailand (MACTHAI) with one of the military intelligence services into the Easy Come for a beer one afternoon.

At first, George concluded there was no way Connie ought be what I was afraid she was. Then, a couple of weeks later, an excited George walked into my office and told me he'd sponed Connic sitting with a group of American officers and their wives in the officers club at the Chan Prava hotel. Wondering what an R&R har Mamasan was doing mixing with the American military elite. George asked one of those officers about the beautiful That wurnan and learned that Connie was a good friend of several military wives whom she had mee in one of the Christian churches in Bangkok. None of the officers' wives appeared to have any idea that Connic was a successful R&R madam on New Pherburt Road.

The new information made George as suspicious about what Connie really was as I had been. Because he didn't think. it wise that he on back into the Easy Come, he asked me to keep dropping in on Connie and playing the dumb government civilian hoping for an impossible lare. That was fine with me. and after a while Connie and I got to be very good friends-to the point where I learned that while all those American wives abought Connie was a devout Christian, a large bronze seasue of buddhe set on a pedestal in one cutner of her hedroom.

To this day George can't prove that Connic was doing what we both decided she had to be doing, but she was proliably one of the most cleves intullarence case officers who ever e orked the business.

George never was sure for whom she was working, either. It could have been the Russians, Red Chinese, or North Koreans, or she might even have been an independent intelligence entrepreneur. But whoever she served, the gobs of information Comie's girls squeezed, fondled, and drew our of the parade of Gls who wandered into the Easy Come almost certainly went straight to Hanot.

The dozen guls who worked in the Easy Come at any unit making, and a whole for smarter than the average girl just off the farm servicing GIs in the other places along the Phethuri strip. Connie's girls all spoke English, although sometimes heavily accented, but always well enough to ask questions and listen carefully while a guy fresh from a good orgasm bragged about what a great soldier he mis.

The Easy Come girls were great actors who could sell an illusion of love as quickly as Houdini could slip out of hand-cuffs. Most of the time, a grunt who spent a night with one of Connie's girls didn't go locking for love anywhere else for the remaining days of his R&R. If he did want a change of vaginus, he went back to the Easy Conte to find a. At least once a week, some soldier left town in desperate love with one of the Easy Come girls. Many of them kept woising the girl for weeks and months after their R&R. A few signed up for an extra tour in 'Nam just so they could get a 30-day leave and take it in Bangkok in the arms of one of Greenie's girls.

It wasn't just vets from Victnam who found the Easy Comes. There were 40,000 U.S. airmen stationed in Thailand during thme years, and a couple of shousand members of the other armed services worked out of the Joint United States Military Assistance Group (JUSMAG) and MACTHAL compound located near the U.S. Embassy on Wireless Road, Most of them considered a visit to the R&R bars the worst kind of slumming, but if they happened to stumble into the Easy Come. Connie made suse they found something a little extra special that brought them back time and again. I know of four different girls from the Easy Come who married Bangkokbased GIs during the years I tracked events in the bat, and at least half a dozen more who did tourslong shack-ups with U.S. mulitary personnel. Every time a gui left to take up a full-time love situation. Course would find another who fit the special personality of the Easy Come girls.

('robably '9') percent of the grunts who found the Easy Come didn't have much worth knowing locked up in their gonad-driven brains. But it was a dirt-cheap spy network with the U.S. GIs paying for most of the cost out of the money they had saved for months before getting a seat on an R&R flight. Connie was learning details about unit size and location, patrol operational techniques, ambush methods, unit morale problems, pending troop movements, beach defenses, river patrol toutes. GI black market activities, and damn near anything also a GI might know about how America was fighting the war in Victorian.

As for the guys stationed in Thailand, every secret known to the JUSMAG compound, including planned bombing targets in Lans, was at risk any time a soldier stopped into the Easy Come.

Connic had that knack for spotting a potential payoff that makes a case officer a master of the trade. Once in a while, one of the R&R customers would let it slip that he was working someplace important, like maybe the Military Attituated Command. Victnam (MACV) compound in Suigun or a brigade headquarters up north. Marks like that went back to Victnam and would soon thereafter asset a little Victnamese book girl, or maybe even a European female employee with some international aid organization who seemed to know recinctively just exactly what the young man liked when it came to loving. None of the Americans had any reason to suspect that their sudden good lick in Saigon was directly fied to their R&R and the girls they left behind in Thailand.

Occasionally, someone would spill something big. George was sure that one of Counic's customers let slip the wrong bir at information back in Sugen to a French mattern working has a trading company, which resulted in a supper attack that halled an Astroy of Vietnam (ARVN) two-star general in an explosion in a Sugon restaurant. I'll always be convinced that it was another of Countr's customers who blew the information about the surgains attack into Cambodia that allowed the Vietcong command sourcture to disappear before the troops got to the target.

Connie wasn't just working the R&R trade either. Playing her second role as the devout Christian Eurasian, she was doing all sorts of friendly things to help the U.S. military and embassy wives she met at church as Sunday survive the expaniate life in Bangkok. She arranged up-country trips to old temples, set up cultural nights where the Americans could watch Thai dancing, and even organized a Thai-American Buddhist study group.

She also helped the American ladies find household help. The Thai women whom Connie sent around as work as cooks, maids, and haby-sitters weren't quite at young and pretty at the girls sitting at the har in the Easy Come, but they were bright, they spoke passable English, they worked hard, they mested the Jarang (American or European) kids with lots of losse, and they didn't steat. Although none of the mains ever figured it out, as perhaps didn't want to admit it even to themselves. Counie's maids were also ready and willing as give the main of the losses a quick taste of Thai love is the servants' matters while his wife was off studying That column with Connie.

George's military spooks never told the Thai government what they were sure Connie was doing. They didn't usue amy warnings to the troops or worn the gaggle of military and embassy wives that their house servants were probably spying for the Communists.

Smart intelligence officers don't arrest, murder, or destroy the public maps of good spies. They either use them or neutralize them, but they always try not to let the spies know they have been made. In the spy game, the devil you know is a thousand times better than the devil you don't know. Destroy a spy ring you know about and a new spy ring you know about and a new spy ring you know nothing them; will soon be watching you.

After I alerted George about my suspicions of Connie and the Easy Come, he set up a section in his area organization that did nothing but monitor Connie and her area from For the next two years, every GI who wandered was the Easy Come was photographed and identified by manual working for George. Those who were nothing but and grunts went back to 'Nam, fought the war, and lived in died without ever suspecting how close they had come to a major spy ting. Those who did have access to information of poregrial intelligence value went back to Vietnam to find that new duties awared them that kept their hands off classified documents and their asses much closer to real combat.

The same thing happened with the Bangkok officers' seems and their husbands who stepped into Connec's web. Most of them were never told the truth about Connec. The wives kept going on up-country trips and sitting through cultural education while their housemaids taught their husbands the subtle differences between Asian and American feminine anatoms.

A few goys did get sudden transfers, like one U.S. Air Force embassy attaché I personally knew who suddenly found himself flying combat missions out of Uhon while his family went back to the States.

Connie kept collecting a im of information, some of it probably useful to those who received her product. What else was happening was that George's counterintelligence group starting feeding Connic's girls but and pieces of false information. Some of the guys filtering into the Easy Come to encouraging their wives to take one of Connie's up-country trips knew exactly what they were doing—participating in what eventually became the single most effective disinformation compagn we had going in Southeast Asia until the time we pulled out of 'Nam.

For example, a rumor once suddenly flashed through the MACTHAI compound that entire companies in I Corps were onable to climb out of bed because of a new and virulent mutation of penteillin-resistant genorrhea spreading through the troops. Within days, the officers' wives were all talking about it as they took one of Connie's up-country trips. A week lates, a Vietnong battalion launched a series of surprise attacks in I Corps expecting to earth wink troops not fit for combat. They died on the wine in droves.

On another occasion, one of the U.S. Army's best snipers and his sporter sook an R&R at the same time in Bangkok and went straight from their hatel to the Easy Come. Five tage later, on the last night of a glorious time, the two of them got skunk drunk with two of Connie's girls and started talking to each other about their plans for taking out a key North Vietnamese battalion commander.

If the two stam had really done what they talked shout doing that night in Bangkok, they would have walked straight into an ambush. Instead, B-52s carpet-bombed the area, churning is an hamburger two companies of the crack northern troops committed to the ambush.

This was an especially successful countenetelligence operation because George doubled Connie's entire any ring without making any direct contact with a single member of the enemy network, a real coup in the intelligence game. While it is almost impossible to estimate the actual impact of the cleves are of human resources in any soy operation. Connie unknowingly passed on enough from information that she probably did more for the U.B. was effect than many of the intelligence case officers working an our side.

Like all good things, it didn't last forever. Eventually, some general in Hanni must have begun to suspect that the information supplied by Connie's spy sing was no longer at valuable as it had more been and that much of it not only proved to be inaccurate but it sometimes backfired. The many that happened, the less they could trust any information she produced for them.

In late 1971. I left Bangkok for a mor in another part of the world. The last time I dropped by us see Connie, she looked nervous, almost like she was frightened about something. I had gone in the Easy Come for a last good-bye and to tell her a cover story that I was quitting my government contract job and going home to get a law degree. Weeks before that, she had started hinting that maybe an should get a lot friendlier than we already were, which was pretty damn friendly.

Josa before I got up from her bed to leave, she asked me why I didn't many her and take her with me to wherever I was going. It was a serious offer, and I might have taken her up on it if there hadn't been a wall of hes herween us that neither of un could ever break down.

I saw Connie once more in 1984 when I spotted her in a shapping center in Crystal City, Virginia, just a few miles from the Penergon. She was hanging outo the sleeve of a guy I recognized at someone who had been assigned to MACTHAI based in the war years as an army major in the difficult crastal office. Two kids just short of their teens were tagging along the I Manua and Daddy as they looked at new refrigerators.

Drived Series, married with children. George's counterespimane operation was so highly classified that Connie's name would have never been put into any visa lookout files, nor the Extens files of other agencies. The guy sits married had no some what his wife had done during the war years or how his two government was using her without her knowing it.

As I stood watching her that day in Crystal City, I envied an guy just a bit. Then she turned and ma me standing them. She recognized me, but she neither smiled nor financed. The man said something, and she turned, gave him a big smile, reached up, and kissed him on the cheek. When the finished the kiss, she turned and looked back at me for just a second, making sure I had seen the kiss. Then she turned and walked away, her arm locked with the arm of her American husband, a Norman Rockwell picture of the perfect area-cultural marriage.

Like all good intelligence assor officers. Connie could build a great illusion and make it made so real that it mally was. The son of a bitch looked as happy as any married man. The ever seen who was taking the family on a shupping trip.

Chapter Two

Spying Has One Purpose

nowing the enemy's defense plans, the secrets of a new weapon system, or the mental state of a political leader can cost or save thousands of leves, depending on who has the knowledge and how they put it to use.

Good spies can keep a government out of war, and incompeters spies can get a government into a war that can't be won. Governments don't just spy on enemies threatening war. The Cold War is over, but both the CIA and the KGB are still in business, and the intelligence case officers of dozens of different conntries recruit and run rings of spies trying to uncover trade secrets, political plots, and military plans, as well as the plans of seriorist groups scattered ground the world.

Governments also spy on their own citizens. The FBI tries is militrate the Mafin and dozens of other organized criminal groups, and the IRS not only collects and examines the financial documents of most major corporations as well as millions of private citizens, but also actively recruits and pays snitches ling to sat on their friends and employers for profit.

IT'S NOT JUST GOVERNMENTS THAT HAVE REASON TO SPY

Almost all of us will at some time know something that will give us an advantage over someone else. Just as likely, we will sooner or later lose something dear and important to us because someone else found out something we thought only we knew shout. Every one of us spics on someone else at one time or another.

- A mother may listen in on a teenage son's call to a girlfriend, hoping she will learn that the girl is not pregnant.
- A man will drive by a girifriend's house to make sure she really is home with a cold.
- A wife will carefully examine the dirty clothes her husband brought back from a trip out of town, looking for signs of lipstick or strands of blond bair.
- An employee will sneak a look in the boss file cabinet, trying to find our who will get the next promotion.
- A father will check out his daughter's boyfriend with a credit bureau.

ALMOST ANYONE CAN HAVE A GOOD REASON TO RECRUIT SPIES

We can all face a situation in which someone has information we must have in order to survive or live well, and the only way we can get it is to steal it. Yer, must actions involved in stealing information—burglars, phone tapping, and bribery are illegal acts with heavy provishments.

The safest way to steal information is to meruit someone who has access to the information who can steal it for us with little risk. Here are just a few examples of how ordinary people might recruit someone to spy on someone else.

· A professional gambler wants an extra edge so he can bey the coaches, secretaries, bus drivers, office managers, and even coaches, secretaries, bus drivers, office managers, and even custodians and janisors who work for professional and college sports teams. His recruited spies provide bits and pieces of information on team morale, injuries, personality clashes, drug abuse, training practices, and any other information that might have an impact on the outcome of a game.

- The American Cancer Society recently discovered its private papers, dating to October 1979, in Philip Morns does ments unveiled by The New York Times and occused the tobacco industry of spying on the society in the 1970s to learn how it planned to address the idea of safet eigerettes.
- Tom White is a successful lawyer who has spies working for him in three of the major insurance companies that handle many of the claims of injured parties. Tom represents in court. As a result of the insider knowledge his spies provide. Tom almost never goes to court. When he does, he wins because he knows the strengths and weaknesses of the other side's case.
- Dan Cocker has made several million buchs in the stock marker using insider information he collects from a halfdezen spies working in major investment firms.

WHAT GOVERNMENT SECRETS SHOULD YOU KNOW?

Americans don't just have good reasons for spying on each taker. Just as an intrusive government spics on its own cities. So cruzens often have good teason to spy on their government. The Mafta has been doing it for years.

Various action groups across the political spectrum, ranging from leftist radicals trying to discover CIA covert operations in Larin America to the new citizen militia groups worand about the Bureau of Akohol, Tobacen and Firearms, are spring on government agencies.

Persons who are called investigative reporters are often intelligence operatives trying to recruit a secure at employces as spies so they can make money and fame by revealing the government's dirty secrets in headline stories.

Many of your fellow citizens as well as cruzens in other countries have been spying on government officials for a long time. For instance:

- No one knows how many real estate speculators around the country have tapped into the secret planning meetings of county commissioners, state highway departments, and city and planning commissions.
- Any executive officer of any big corporation who isn't collecting daily information from a rang of spice working in the federal agencies that control and regulass every aspect of his business could be heading down a fast track to failure.
- One of the unfold secrets of the business of lobbying Congress and state legislatures is that many lobbyists are more interested in intelligence than vote buying. U.S. congressmen and senators would be harrified if they knew how many people on their staffs are regularly passing information on to people representing businesses and industries that they are targeting for more restrictive regulation.
- Employees of the IRS, the Security Exchange Commission, the Patent Office, the Food and Drug Administration, the Federal Trade Commission, the Office of Sufety and Health Administration, and on through the alphabet soup of bureaucracy all have tons of commercial information that they are supposed to keep secret. Yet each of those agencies has hundreds of unhappy, angry, indebt employees who can be recruited to provide such confidential information.

WHO IS SPYING ON YOU?

Even if you live a life to which you can't imagine that you would ever have to spy on someone else, you may be the subject of someone else's spying. If you are the leader in a competitive industry, ever get involved in politics, take a public position on any divisive issue, or have a nice home and position in your community and people envy you, you know something that someone else can use against you—if he can find out what it is. It may be a manufacturing technique or pocess, a special tecipe used in a restaurant you own, a guarded list of chents, an idea for a new invention, your credit card and PIN numbers, a secret love affair, a past you've overcome, a bit of extra income you don't report on your IRS form, or a test that you keep hidden from the world.

If you want to protect your own secrets, you must know have successful spics operate so that you have some chance at sotting the person who you think is a loyal friend, a lover, a musted employee, or a harmiess, casual sequaintance, but sho, in fact, is out to steal your secrets and give them to the person who will use them to do you the most harm.

Proceeding yourself from those who would steal your waters is as much a part of a personal defense strategy as armsec yourself and guarding your fonce lines.

Before we go any further, a note on semantics is in order. In an effort at brevity and clarity. I will use the pronouns he and down as nongender specific, rather than using the name name and phrases he or he or her. This does not mean that himseles do not make excellent spies and case agents. In fact, name of the most dangerous spies and effective spy namenes have been female, as the examples throughout this book make abondantly clear.

The Basic Principles of Spying

There are several different ways to steal secrets. Among the most effective of these means are the following three:

there are used Surveillance: A spy socialing into the exercise camp to count the sick and wounded, or bridge in the count while others talk outside the door, is engaging in obsertion and surveillance. Modern covert surveillance includes cover out, the photography, planting sected microphones, social criting telephone calls, surreputiously reading mad, and man, other techniques.

Like many technical advances in tadar, sonar, spy satellites, an armore and high-altitude photography, high-tech electron-tention turns, and total photography describes and video conservas, electronic signal interfers and computer-based deciphering of encrypted nesses, we all designed to improve methods of cover observation and conventance. Modern national intelligence agencies spending exceptionics of their budgets on high-tech surveillance.

The and Burglary. This is a frequent plot in spy movies and pop literature. The hero burglarizes an embassy cracks the rate, takes picture of the secret documents, and then sneaks away with an one the wiser. Despite their popularity with authors of spy stories, burglary and theft are seldom used in the real world of spying. They are too high risk with the little chance of success. It was such an attempt at hurgiary that eventually length down President Richard Nason.

The Inside Sign: This means using a human being who has direct access to valuable some; knowledge to steal that houseledge. Some examples are the confidential informant in a drug gang who is under the control of DEA agents, the FBI plant driving a group of bumbers around foun while they plan to blow up the World Trade Center, the Soviet colonel passing on KGB secrets to a CIA contact, the U.S. Marine embassis guard entrapped into spying by a pretty gul he met ut a Museuw cafe, or Aldrich (Rick) Ames the CIA officer who made millions parsong senters to the Sosters while he drew his U.S government paycheck. This is what intelligence officers are talking above: when they use the word HUMINT when discussing intelligence cultecting activities. (HUMINT) stands for horson intelligence, that is, intelligence collected by a burnan being rather than by capturing an electronic signal or taking premies from a vatellite.

Despite the fact that human space still operate to much the same way they have for the last several hundred years, the spy can often obtain information and intelligence that cannot be discovered by other means. The unide spy not only can gain access to documents and plans locked up in safes, he can provide information on what people are talking about in privare, the personality strengths and weaknesses of enemy leaders, internal strife within an entern organization, and the espionage techniques the enemy is using to steal searcta-

Sometimes the human spy can be an incredibly cheap source. of intelligence, even though the product is extremely valuable-Such a spy may not seen know that he is providing information to the enemy. That was the case with all those guys on R&R who walked into im Easy Come in Bangkok.

SPIES CAN IIII MORE THAN JUST STEAL SECRETS

Once an intelligence officer regulirs a spy inside an enemy court, he has someone at his command who is not only able to recol retets but who can also engage in a variety of coven a mone that will cause the entirely problems. A spy inside an esem. Tamp can engage in sabotage and spread jumors and -- that mislead the enemy and may even destroy the reputaa. o. leaders. The sempration to use spies for more than we shing servets is problem every national intelligence agency here Every intelligence agency and those who lifte the intelbecause efficers must always balance the demand for muelliplant against the demands for using a spy fur covers action.

Whereas this book will focus on the recruitment of spies with the intention of stealing seviets, anyone can use the same methods to recruit a sps who will destroy property, lose ties sell has spread researce, play directricks that demoralor the enemy, and phillips in other destructive activities. Also, a py who has been stealing secrets can often be rediresto-finite sahotage.

SPY RECRUITMENT FACTS

Park up any catalog of books on exprenage and savestigamen of famoues and you will find lots iff other explaining to search through public records, even mum titles sensiting surveillance recliniques as well as the high-tech a proposent available for succellance and how to we in-There are also lots of books telling a potential apy how to as a confer and open safes. You can learn how to make bombs and it cans of different kinds of gadgets and tools that can be pure subutage, how to tail a suspect, how to spot sumeone realing you, and how to use computer encryption programs so was can send messages that no one except the person you used them to can read.

in all those instructions on how to spy, you will find almost nothing explaining how to recruit 1 spy who will report a set information from inside the enemy's came

The secrets of how to recruit spies are closely guarded to those who have learned how to use them. Such government intelligence agencies as the CIA, KGB, British Mi6, and the Mussad go to incredible efforts to custure that their methods if recruiting spies are not exposed to public view. Anyone was works for my of those agencies must sign a contract agreeing as most reveal the spycraft secrets learned while working as an intelligence collector.

The intelligence agencies of powerful world governments don't keep these trade secrets to themselves. The secrets of spy recruitment are anything but secret between agencies. The KGB knows everything the CIA knows about the different ways to recruit a spy. Nothing in this basic is going to tell the KGB, Mossad, PLO. Mafia, drug cartely, as even the intelligence services of such countries as Peru, Bohvia, Cuba, and Uganda unything they don't already know.

Government intelligence agencies keep their recruiting techniques hidden from the public because they don't amount the general population knowing how they recruit and use opies. This secrety serves two purposes. First, it makes it easy for government agencies to recruit ordinary citizens as spies because such people don't spot the watning signals that they are being recrimed. Second, the secrety helps a government ensure that its critizens don't start appling on it and finding out just how incompetent, and sometimes engined, it can be

A SPY IS ALWAYS A TRAITOR

A spy steals information from people who trust him and to whom he owes loyalty and then gives or selfs that valuable information to their enemies. Most people don't want to become traitors, and, just as important, those who would willingly become traitors are almost never in positions where when to steal. Therefore, the intelligence collector must mornit spies who will do his work in such a way that I) the mount spies who will do his work in such a way that I) the mounts don't realize that they are spies, 2) he fools them not thinking they are smi really doing anything so terrible, at the maps them in a situation in which they have not home But to give the enemy intelligence officer the infurmation he demands.

This is the primary eraft of the intelligence collector who must rely as homen resources—the air of convincing people to annual treason against their massay, their employer, their political amounts, their friends, and even their loved ones.

Once a citizen understands the means of convincing peotive to spy an chose who trust them, he was the tools he can use the tools the secrets of an intrusive government, the big corpotive the islant amon, law famis, a criminal organization, or me wher powerful group that wants to control his life and take his money and wealth fust like the armed citizen is the pomary defense against both the criminal and an unjust government, so too is the citizen who knows and understands the rate of recruiting same prepared to defend himself against the money as well am government intent on limiting the ficeture of its non-citizens.

Professions and horeaucrats don't want you to learn the costs of spying for the same reasons they don't want you to keep your arms or your right to self-defense. The craft of spying be at important a weapon in the defense of your free-

Despite the secrets under which they are butied, the principles and secrets of spying are telatively simple to learn and practice. Anythe who wants to discover information meone the is holding can recruit and organize a ring of siles and put them so work ferreting and the required information. It need and be that expensive: a successful intelligence-collection operation may consist of m few as two or three people.

Who Is a Spy and Who Is Not

o employees of the CIA, KGB, MIb, Mossad, to star other international spy agency consider themselves spies. They will mast that they are lovel employees of their government, whose job it is to recruit spies. Often they work in the embassies of their country and are identified as diplomats or other government employees.

They work undercover as outsinessment journalists, midenty, or tournals, and sometimes they sheak into the countries of their systems is, someone prerending to be a national or a level resident of the target country.

Regardless of what cover they work under, they not only only only interested the spies, they almost always hold to ontempt the people they recruit as spies and consider the true to be low-life trainers to their sum country and culture.

Intelligence officers who recruit and run spies to spy for them are called case officers, or name agents. The app, or the ment, as he is called in more polite talk, is the trainer who sale as gives away secrets he talk been entrusted to keep the This book explains how the case officer does his work and how our ordinary citizen can practice the same skills in the private collection of intelligence. The case officer is the keystone of all HEMINT intelligence-collection operations. Every ring of spies has a case offices who recruited each spy and who controls and manages the activities of such link in the ring.

THE ATTRIBUTES OF A CASE OFFICER.

In his book The Craft of Intelligence, Allen Dulles listed the personal attributes of a good case officer as someone who pos-

- is perceptive about people
- · works with orhers under difficult conditions
- · is able to distinguish between fact and fiction
- is able to distinguish between the essentials and the nonessentials
- possesses inquisitiveness.
- · pays attention to detail
- has good end consmunication skills.
- · knows when to keep his mouth shut - · understands other games of view, and
- is highly motivated and does not depend on public tecognition.

Dulley also claimed that he preferred to recruit the good, honest citizen and train him to fit; an intelligence office; bother than to seek not people who are naturally devices, non-spirotorial, or wify.

If Dulles actually believed that, it explains who I. S intelligence has in often failed, especially in the recruitment of human resources. "Buy Scours" who respect and oney the rules of honesty, trustworthiness, loyalty, and friendship don't do well as ease officers, who necessarily have to be devicus, conspiratorial, and dishonest.

My experience with U.S. cover intelligence officers who did produce good intelligence by recruiting spies successfully is that they were indeed naturally devious and that they were on the career they chain like wolves to the hund. They conindered the ability to deceive to be a major part of a game they atmixed playing, and they developed great pride in their abilities to deceive.

DIFFERENT WAYS TO FIND A SPY

The person who wastes to recruit and manage a ring of specs has several different types of personalities to might rearries to do she dirty work of spying. Each different type becomes a spy for a variety of different reasons and emotional productions.

Two Inadvertent Spy

These are people like all those GIs who walked into the have Come while on R&R in Banghok. They don't deliberate to become spies, but instead give away secrets without knowing what they are doing. They are man and woman with loose i.p., had properly attitudes, who talk impress with colleagues in buts and sometimes, who talk impress with colleagues in buts and sometimes and who brag about their work to their lovers, their friends, and sometimes to their lovers, their friends, and sometimes to their lovers of all. They cost little of nothing collapse, and they present few risks to the case officer.

For the present citizen who is trying to get information on a impetitor, a little government agency, a businessman with soon he is having a dispute, or a bad amphilise or personal enemy, the madvertent spy can often be the only source one code to cultivate. The trick is to figure out how to get such a serson talking about what the knows without letting him guest that he is making a big mistake that may east dearly.

The Defector as a Spy

Much of the intelligence information that the United States collected from human resources during the Gold War water from people who fled the Soviet Union or one of the other communist countries. Most were anytous to share any secrets they brought out with them in exchange former identities and a chance to live in subuthan Amenca. Although most refugees fleeing the communist paradises had little of no intelligence information, occasionally a defector would come from the KGB, the Soviet military, of some important ministry. That didn't happen all that often, however, because though life in the Soviet Hinton was hard it is brutal, those who successfully built eareers in the government burezucaes in politary command structure impoved a hving trandard far above that of most citizens.

When defections from the upper ranks did occur, the intelligence usually had value for a limited time. The Soviet security apparatus, knowing that the defector had fled to the West, would immediately intente a damage-control operation by changing code books, withdrawing take against and spreather defector might know about, and sometimes even moving critical plants and weapons locations.

A good case officer can encountige someone to added by using many of the same sechniques used to rectuit spies. However, it makes much more sense as recruit a same tion of encountage someone to defect. A spi will continue as provide intelligence for many years, a defector is a sme-time intelligence source.

High-making Sovart defectors would sometimes contact Western intelligence officers prior to their defection and artempt to make a deal for resettlement in tentra for intelligence information. When that happened, Western intelligence officers would try to talk the potential defector make temaining in place for a few months or years and serving as a apy. There is no evidence that may potential defectors bought into such a deal.

The Soviets benefited from the few defectors from the Western ranks. In most eases in which Western cirizens with intelligence information defected, they were long-time spies such as Kim Philby, who fled to avoid capture after being exposed and spy.

The Walk-In Spy

People sometimes walk in and volunteer to spy. That's after John Walker, a U.S. Navy perty officer working as a nee clerk, did when he walked into the Soviet Embassy in Washington, D.C., carrying with him a collection of stolen beatments as evidence of what he could provide. Walker as motivated putely by a desire to make many, and he exertically proved in he one of the most staluable spies the kGB ever ran.

CIA agent that Ames the the same thing, although he didn't have to wilk into the Soviet Embassy. Has job put him directly in contact with Soviet intelligence officers, and all like last to do was drop a few hints that he was looking for new country of manner. Ames did his embre country even more distance than this that

One reason why we few Americans ever defected to the Social is that the American who was willing to sell out his matter could be every well by staying in place for years, enjoying the advantages all of us in this maintry enjoy, plus the extra recomes paid for with the money they carned as traiters.

Despite the fact that walk-ins can be very valuable, most an intelligence agetaires floor trust them. There is always the inspicion that the walk-in might be a plant (that is, a because attempt by the enemy to spread disinformation and the intelligence) of a total fread—someone trying to sell melligence be doesn't have and each per.

Exercises lands that the CIA. KGB. MI6. and every their intelligence agency around the world will pay good ones for secret managence. A surprising number of people think they talt cish in on that by pretending to have access to make when they don't. Sometimes fraudulent walk-ins make they who believe they are getting secret information of more psychic vibrations, foreign spaceships, or a tooth filling that picks up radio waves from distant countries. More often, the fraudy are deliberate trooks hoping to make an easy buck. If they also happens to hold real government jobs, they actually culleer money for a while before they are found out.

The stories that such features to use sell as intelligence information often follow the headlines. For years after the IIII of Vietnam, every U.S. Embassy in Southeast Asia saw a string of people walking in and claiming they had intelligence on U.S. Gls still missing in action. The more elever frauds would tell complicated stories, early detailed maps, and sometimes even photos of supposed prisoners who were still alive. All of those frauds shared non-invariant thread: they claimed that there was one piece will missing, but that they could find that piece if they only had a III of money—say, a million dollars or so—to pay off the right prison guard. Vietnamese military officer, local merchans, or other source

So many walk-ins do indeed prove to be either frauds in persons deliberately attempting its spread disinformation that it's easy to understand why intelligence officers have been known to dismiss legitimate walk-ins as frauds.

One of the most productive spies the CIA ever ran inside the Sovier Union was Oleg Vladimirovich Penkovsky, a market placed Soviet military officer who take apparently more ated by a political conviction that see was preventing a blessess than war by passing on secret defense information to the West Yes. the first time Penkovsky approached and Americans. - CIA rejected his offer to spy became it was convinced that he was a Soviet plant trying is apread disinformation. It was the after British Ml6 tonk up Penkovsky's offer and started ventying what he was providing that the Ameneans tealized they had made a versous mistake in not grabbing him the first time his tried to volunteer. Penkovsky provided a huge assum of information for the next several years. Eventually the KGB caught mi, prohably because of their own intelligence penetrations of the CIA and Botish intelligence, and Fenkovsky was arrested. tried, and execused.

Walk-ins don't happen just at the international political level. Just about anymer with a grudge against a commercial company, government agency, or political organization with which he works can decide to take revenge by talking to someone willing to pay good money for good information.

The Planted Spy

One way for an intelligence agency to get a spy in the right party is to have someone seek employment with the government business or agency that the intelligence officer wants to see on. This is called insertion, placement, in going undersome. This should not be confused with the illegal case officer, who is case officer who sneaks into a country with a false identity the intention of recruiting spics once he is there.

Although it is a popular fiction plot, national spy agencies almost seem attempt on plant one of their seem employees or ole a foreign government. The CIA would not, for example attempt to infiltrate a trained CIA intelligence officer into Cuba with the expectation that he would neek employment with the Cuban Ministry of Defense by using a filte identity.

It isks of such an operation are too great, and the difficulties of establishing a credible cover me almost insurmount.

Even if the effort succeeded, the spy might have to see in in place for veers, living a constant lie, before he ever wo: Interpretations necessary to give him access to secrets the would be worth stealing. Also, there is always a chance in the person stayed in place, he would make friends and executably gink so close to those with whom he worked the would refuse to spy, or worse. But he would become a don"c agent."

Such law enforcement agencies as the DEA and the FBI will sometimes insert a spy into some common organization. Although a police officer may go undercover, it will almost always be for a short period of time, generally an more than a tex days. Instead, police agencies will usually try as plant a criminal they have eaught, promising him a lesser sentence if that produce evidence on a suspected criminal organization by working as a member of the gang.

It is almost always easier in recruit someone who is already in place than it is to insert a spy in a new employee. Anyone intending to engage in a bit of domestic spying should first attempt to recruit a spy in place and should only consider the possibility of planting a spy when any efforts have proved to be impractical of impossible.

The Recruited Spy

If an intelligence officer can find an one with loose lips not anyone wants to defect to his side, and the knows that planting a spy is unlikely to work, then the only option is to toctuit someone who is already working for the government agency, business, or political organization he wants to spy on Such a person will probably have no intention of spying on those who must him and would immediately reject an impolicited offer that he spy for money. Therefore, the same officer will have in figure out a way to track, bribe, or blackmail mail a person into agreeing to become a spy.

The Doubled Spy

The final way to find a spy is to catch someone make any you. As we learned in the first chapter, many make are not shot when they are caught; they are doubled fisther they are used without knowing they are being used—like what happened as Connic and her girls—or they are forced to cooperate. Those who catch the spy give him a choice of either being shot spending a major portion of his life in prison. By working for the people he has been apping on white pretending to still be loyal to those who reemitted him as a app.

Generally, like in Connie's area doubled spies are used to pass fake intelligence as the enemy, hopefully intelligence that will convince the enemy that one as stronger, bester prepated militarily, and readier to fight than the enemy previously estimated. Doubled spies can also provide information on the enemy's intelligence methods. They can explain how they were recruited, how they made drops, how they were handled, who sime handlers were, and an the other details of running spies. The spy who is eaught, and then doubled, with also seem to remark clean about what damage he has already done. He will have to provide all the details on what kind of intelligence information he passed on to the people he was spying for.

This kind of information is so important that even when a spy can't be doubled, it still pays to get him to talk. That's why intelligence agencies are always willing to plea bargain when they catch one of their own spying for the enemy.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF AGENTS RECRUITED BY CASE OFFICERS

Depending on the type of intelligence operation he is running, a good case officer may recent three different types of agents pinning, access, and support. All of them 200 he traitors in that they will be working for the enemy while prelending to remain loyal to their country, employer, political eroup, or family

A primary many is someone who is working in a position in a government, indicate force, or political group where his has these access to secret documents, the convenations of senior dicers, or, better still, someone who directly participates in policy-making or operational activities.

If primary agent can also be a terminal secretary, driver, messenger, or angular clies who has access to documents, communications, and personnel who deal with secret information. The girls at the Easy Come were working as primary agents for Contine. Here case officer.

An exact agent is a recruit who does not have any lifect access to useful intelligence or any personal relation to such people, but who may know someone who does. An access agent may also have access to places where potential primary agents work or play. The access agent can then report on peoarrange for the case officer in make an approach. An access agent may even do some recruiting under the close superviof the case officer.

Access agents can also be used to place hidden animal phones, cameras, and other rechnical surveillance devices. For example, a case officer might recruit a januar working in = embassy and have him plant a nucrophone in the ambassador's office while cleaning it was

A rapport agent is also recruited by a case afficus, who will usually have a number of these agents. A support agent minforms services for the case officer such as doing surveillance. dury, managing rafe houses, clipping news stories, renting cars, making and picking an drops, purchasing supplies, and stion. Often they are openly employed by government intelligence agencies and report to work in the case officer's embassy. Most was officers will employ more support agents than actual soies. The same basic techniques are used for recruiting each kind of agent.

A ring of spies is not a sports fearn in which each player knows how he relates to every other player on the main. In most eases. It spies in a ring of spies won't know who the other spies are. They operate under $150 security principle of presentations tabization, which requires that each player our spy ring its given only that information that he needs to know in 56 his job.

The reasons for this are obvious. First, if one spy is identified (compromised), the enemy cannot use him to identify other spies of verify that they exist Indeed, the total is seen its which the captured spy believes he is the only person spying on the operation. Second, the man officer can use each one of his spies to verify information collected from his other spies.

An intelligence agency like the CIA can achieve man more effective compartmentalization by using different pass officers to recruit and run different perm working within the corget organization.

Sometimes it is necessary to have two in more recruited spies working together in what is usually called a cell. The primary agent might be reporting to an access agent in pass on the information to the case officer, while also depending - a service agent in develop exposed minima film. The Soviets made very effective now of such a cell structure in the early years of the Cold War. Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss were members of one such cell within the U.S. Department of Many intelligence experts believe that other such cells existed but were never discovered. Because of Soviet comparamentalization. Chambers had no information on the exisrence of such cells.

Even though the spies to the cells of spies will not know string each other, the sun officer must manage each individ-In the run as that the work of each any complements the spins of the others.

WHAT THE GOVERNMENT CAN DO. ANYONE CAN DO

Anyone who knows the techniques that case officers working for Ills CIA, KGB, MI6, and Mossad one to recruit spics sun usa those same techniques to operate an intelligence-collection operation against any business, government agency, political preparations, or individual.

- · First, was must determine what information it is that use must have, who probably has it, and who has access to those who have the information.
- Second, you must desermine what the best way of getting that information is, what it will cost to get such information, what the chances are of getting caught in the process, and what difference having the information might make in success in failure.
- . Third, some most again a plan for getting the information and then implement that plan.
- Fourth, if you are successful, mm must determine whether or not the stolen information is true.

Finally, after concluding that the information is valid, as must set on it, even if you must change your mind about reality (the truth of the situation, regardless of whether a is what pure want to hear, or not).

Just as the Mossad is much smaller than the Reill, the private citizen working as a private intelligence officer and down-size his effort to meet the limitations in his needs, budget, will time. Just the person may fin in the intelligence international involved in a lawsuit, a small-business labor problem, a dispute with some local tax or licensing official, or an argument with a neighbor over a fence line, neighborhood nuisance, or bit of vandalism.

Even so, the private citizen who has out in recent and run a ring of spics and faces like same problem confronting every intelligence case utilizer: was does he convince uniquent to turn transpand and was appling as people who trust him?

Chapter Five

The Making of a Traitor

hy would anyone turn traitor? How does an intelligence case officer make it happen? There are only four basic ways to get someone as downed you want them to 65: 1) offer mutual enoperation to see that common goals 2) suggest a hargained exchange, 3) use trait, and 4) use force.

- Waited cooperation makes when we at more people want the same thing and agree in work together to achieve that goal. A whole town tomo out to light a fire and must the swn. A man and a woman marry and mise children together. A hand of revolutionaries risk life, limb, and fortune because they all want a new form of government.
- The bargained enchange is the basis of the free market. It is two was get strangers to do something we want or give us something we need. We do it by agreeing to give them corrections was have that they want. As Adam Smith pointed out, the taker cares not a whit for my happiness, but he

- rapplies me with bread in terum for the money I pay him. Fraud occurs when one person consinces another person to do something with a false promise that he will get sumething he wants in return. It politician promises the voter good government and low taxes when he intends to use government for his own enrichment and expects to raise taxes to make that possible. A television evangelist promises eternal life and the love of God to all who will send him money, even though he knows he cannot guarantee either. What we call manipulation is almost always fraud. We manipulate someone into doing our building by convincing him that he will get tome reward that we can't deliver.
- With force, we threaten to injure. Lift, or physically restrain someone unless he does exactly what we want him to do. His life or his money! Pay his rates or go to just high the freaty or go to war!

Often, this process of wanning cooperation takes place with little or no thought. Two men agree or go fishing and help each other through the day because they both more to each as many fish as possible, in maybe they just want the pleasure of each other's company. We walk into the drugstore, pick up a package of rator blades, and take it to the cash tegister me pay for it. We drive the speed limit that is posted and pay our takes without complaint.

Sometimes, someone must first consince us that it is in out own best interest to participate in a deal by selling us at the benefits we will receive by using a certain kind of soap, giving to a charity, or enlisting to fight in a war. Salestmanship thus becomes an integral part of the equation. A good sales technique can be merely educational, but areas often at includes a large dose of fraud and manipulation.

The person who wants to recruit a spy many convince the potential recruit that it is in his own best interest to spy much those who trust him.

The Spy Who Believes in the Cause

The mann spy to the spine who wants what he thinks has spying will produce. Julius and Ethyl Rosenberg and Kim thaths became Soviet spies because they wanted a Socialist world, and they thought that spying for the Soviets man the test way to get it. Soviet eithers sometimes became spies for the United States because they saw the failures of communion within their own society and the human misery it profitted or they feated that the Soviet leaders were risking a hisistrous nuclear war.

liqually when someone is driven to treaton by idenlogy, he was loves his country but believes that the country's leaders have failed the nation and are leading the society down the road to rain. Such people rationalize treasun by insisting their they are not betraying their nation, their hirthright, or their culture, but instead are opposing the evil people who have taken control M the government.

Playing on this natural human rendency, U.S. intelligence officers assigned to rectait Soviet around would never say any thing negative about Russia, the enforce or the people, but would instead its to separate the Communist Party apparatus from the Russian nation. They acted toward their recruits as though they were not recruiting traitors, but the 2d patriots withing to risk all by opposing the enminals who had taken nation in the Motherland.

Spice for Pay

Give me the secrety I want to know and I'll make you a treb mun." Many apies 15 it for the money This is the easiest attribution to understand and, indeed, to put to use. We don't like to admit it, but greed drives every human being. Almost everyone has a price, and once in intelligence officer knows are price of sun individual, the process of recruiting is reduced to bargaining the exchange; how much will it cost me by each secret and steal?

Tradicionally, intelligence officers, especially those who have previously worked with true believers, have distrusted the spy motivated by greed. A greedy person is often difficult to control and manipulate because his loyalines only extend in the next higher offer for his services. Yet in the modern world money has played an increasingly important role in the tecrnitment of spies. This has been especially some in the recrnitment of Americans willing in spy for the "Communist bloc" materials. Addisch Ames, John Walker, and FRI agent Richard Miller were all in a for the money.

Once the KGB and as allies learned how easy it was as buy some Americans, their recruitment efforts in the last years of the Gold War focused increasingly on those most likely in he entired by financial reward—young, low-paid personnel such as code clerks, secretaires, and similar government employees, who did not belong to the privileged class of the upper-cehelon histograms.

Crass spies willing to must traiter for a profit are easy to recruit, once they have been identified. They are often walkins. In other cases, a potential museum may be mustally bestiant to turn traiter for a must, and the case officer will first have to do a selling job. Like nov good salesman, he will have to psychologically munipolate the prospect to overcome surreal resistance to the idea of selling out for money.

WHAT TO DO WHEN YOU CAN'T FIND A TRUE BELIEVER OR A GREEDY BASTARD

Most of the time, an intelligence case officer is not going to find either a true believer in someone attents to make money who has access to the secrets the man officer wants. Most people believe in the cause of the company for which they work. They am only believe in it, they think of themselves as the kind of people who cannot be bought, as matter how much money might be offered.

Convincing a Recruit That He Is Doing the Right Thing

This make therefore case officer will have to use fraud and manipulation in order to recruit the great majority of spies who have access to the wanted secrets. The case officer must make the potential recruit believe that his own personal interests will be best served if he becomes a major.

One way to do this is to convince the recruit that the substitute is actually on his side; that is, that they both share the tame ideals and goals. Another way is to manipulate the recruit into believing that by apying, he will man rewards that are rightfully RE and, therefore, justify his turning traitor.

To do this the case officer uses the same techniques a good salesman uses to convince someone to buy an insurance policy that doesn't make good economic sense of a car much too expensive led his hudget. In the case of the salesman might first suggest that the customer really deserves such a fancy piece of non and then manipulate lum into concluding that is can handle is payments.

In convincing a potential recruit to spy, the sum officer, like the car salesman, must play to the target's emotional needs, greed, and fears. The emotional needs can be haved in ideology or personal desires, which sam include revenge, anger, idealism, loneliness, or recognition by someone, even an enemy.

Anger

A mention emotion that motivates many a person to rurn traitor is used at how his government, employer, or associates had treated him. The potential traitor may feel cheared because he has been passed man for promotion, unjustly scrused of something, or simply ignored. The anger may be directed manuscritcher an individual, perhaps a supervisor, or the entire system. Other manuscript that may inspire someone to turn traitor can range from despair in depression to a simple desire to be loved and appreciated.

There are always people who believe that their leaders are misguided and incomperent of that they are unappreciated by bosses and co-workers and have been treated unfairly, causing them to lose their faith as the goals of the organization, but they don't know what is do next. However, even though the subject may have lots of anger bubbling up inside him, he will probably not be thinking about turning traitor when first approached by a case officer. It is my to the recruiter to figure out how to manipulate that anger or other attention in a way will convince the subject that running traits in a che best way to get his revenge or make the world right man.

Sex

Sexual desire is an emotion on which intelligence case officers often play. Sometimes the potential recount is deliberately tuited with a potential lover. Once love breaks out the case officer can make it appear that the lover is in schools trouble, which can only be resolved if the target turns tissue. This was the case with U.S. Marine Clayton Lonetree, the was a security guard in the Soviet Union in the ISSE and was caught spying for sex, court-mariated, and imprisoned l'est is another powerful force that was III used to mampniate people into doing what they don't want to do. Case offiture some blackmail some people into apying "Do me this favor, and I won't tell that you are a homosexual." Intelligence agencies are especially interested in potential amounts with such secret vices as drug addiction, sexual perversion, a green bling habit, or may past history they would prefer not III exposed. Also, once a person has been recruited by manipulating either his emotions or his greed, the some officer may blackmail as a means of ensuring that the trains assessed loval to his new quaster.

Hear.

Using Force in Persuasion

People san be forced to spy It's a technique that law enforcement agencies use all the time. They arrest a low-level drug dealer, prostitute, bookie, or some other petry criminal, then they threaten to pus him in jail for many years unless he agrees to spy in none important criminals.

The Gessapo, the KGB, and other police intelligence agenties often used the threat of violence to retruit spiks, if not by direct threats to the potential spy theo his family. "Remember, you have a wife and a child still living in the old country."

Criminal organizations to the United States and other countries also use threats of violence to recruit spics. Often the threat will be sweetened with some kind of financial reward It's what the Mafia calls "an offer you can't refuse."

Although such threats do work with criminals and sometimes with people who have family living in police states, they seldom succeed in the international spy game or in cases of private spying. You can never predict how someone clie will respond to the threat of violence, but many will choose to fight back. They will go to the police or their security officer. The tasks of exposure for threatening violence and simply too great.

The sman ease officer who needs a spy, and who can't find someone willing to sell out for payment, very probably won't even consider the idea of threatening to commit violence lostead. 55 will look for someone he can manipulate sum spying by playing as his emotions to the point where the target slips into spying without realizing what is happening.

REAL LIFE IS ALWAYS COMPLICATED

Most successful recruitments involve a cumbination of inducements and threats, which play on several different extense that might be driving the person targeted for recruitment. The potential recruit could be a closet homosexual who recently lost a promotion for reasons that had nothing to do with his sexual choices, who is deep in debt, and who just had a long-time lover drop him.

LEG elever man officer will use each of these emutional distresses to manipulate the target into turning trainer. He might first find a more lover for the target, have the lover help build the hate toward the company that refused to promote the target, add a touch of blackmail, and then throw in muffer of easy money to clinch the deal.

LEARNING THROUGH CASE STUDIES

Most government intelligence collection agencies use the case-study methodology in training programs for their case officers. Like most of the case studies in this book, the literating case is taken from a real-life situation, but background information and names have been changed for 10 the usual reasons. The senioris student who is trying a time the an ani science of spying should not spend a lot of time attempting to figure out whether any man study at the real story behind the headlines, but instead should look for what the example teach es about exprenage

Knowing How the Game Is Played Doesn't Make Someone Immune

Ted Breman joined the CIA right out of college in the early 1960s, convinced tool he was taking an a macho career that would be exerting and rewarding or the same time he helped protect America from the communist conspiracy. Things went well at first, but over the years. The became increasingly disillustoned with the nitty-gritty deception that makes up the daily grind of the intelligence case officer working in a foreign country. The promotions didn't come in fast as he expected, and he had several petionality clashes with senior officers whom he considered menuperent dolls anxiot oreport whatever the national political leadership wanted to hear, no matter what the truth might be.

The job also took a till on his personal life. His wife. Millie, grew fired of the problems and isolation of living inforeign countries and frequently fought with him over the long hours of unpaid overtime that Ted put in. Eventually they divorced and Millie rook the children back home to Indiana. Ted found himself paying alimony and child support for three children he almost never we while his ex-wife went back to college. Ted was left with no money for the simple luxuries backelor cam are supposed at enjoy. When a mutual-fond investment he had purchased on the advice of a U.S. husinessman named sour, he added to his list of miseries an anger at the entire American entporate world.

Then, while on an assignment in Buenos Aires, he met Linda, a l'eruvien who was working in Buenos Aires with an international nongovernmental charitable organization. Linda brought some exertement back into Ted's life, not just im a sexual plane, but intellectually as well. While Ted had gone through college as a jock with hitle interest in political then—I and a introduced Jim to books in international politics are world of ideas they discussed with a collection of vigentine and expatriate intellectuals living in Buenos Aires.

Totalis disenchanted with his eateer and arearous to marry Linda. Ted began looking for new employment outside of government. He discovered that such opportunities were practically nonexistent for disenchanted CIA men officer in midearest Feeling trapped and frustrated by the system. Ted found himself increasingly favoinated with the socialist philosophy that Linda and ner friends argued as solutions for everything. Ted saw going wrong with his personal piece of all world.

The one thing going right was that Linda held a U.S. immirant green card and would soon be eligible to apply for U.S. itstenship, a necessary step before Ted could matry her and still keep his security clearance. Three weeks before she was to me that step, a name handed Ted in envelope on a busy street. Buetos Aires, then jumped into a waiting an and sped away. Test opened the envelope on find dorumentary evidence that Linda, while a student in Pero, had belonged to a Peruvian polineal group associated with the Sendero Luminoso or Shining Path." the Maoist nateuterrorist insurgency in Peruvinh deep nes to the min trade and a long history of graphic retrorism. The package contained in messages of any threat of blackmail, but Ted was sure that would soon come.

Ted assumed that whoever had passed on the information intended to blackmail him, probably in an effort at enlist him as a spy. Nevertheless, instead of immediately some on his security officer, he told Linda about the package. She admirted that she had belonged to the political organization for a short period of time several years earlier but insisted that she had drupped out once she discovered the connection to the violent Scodero Luminose.

Although Ted believed Linds's claims of innocence of any intentional involvement with violent revulutionary activities, he also know that if the CIA security personnel learned of the information, they would never approve of his matriage to a person with such a history Indeed, even continuing as date I linds would be a case breach of security that would cost feed his security clearance. Ted also worned has his own security people might have passed him the documentation as some kind of test to see if he would handle the revelations according on regulation

Linda tearfully announced that this only course of action was for them in immediately stop scenng each other. She insisted that Ted should go straight to his seconty officer, report the incident, and give the embassy the evidence of Linda's past political activities. That would save Ted's execut but the exposure of Linda's past political indiscretions would cost Linda her job and make her ineligible for U.S citizenship. Unemployed and unable to travel to the United States, she would have no choice but as return to Peru where she might face charges of sedition by the Peruvian government.

Ted anguly replied that he would instead teagn immediately. They could then get married as soon in possible and man over to man other country. Linds pointed an that neither would have a job at any prospects for finding employment. Linds would still have to at back to Linds, and it would take months or even years for Ted to find some kind of work that would allow him to support Linda in a country other than the United States.

As they discussed the problem through the night with time our for a couple of manual sessions of lovemaking. Ted became more and more vociferous in 118 disdain for his career with the government. He repeatedly invisted that he would do anything to protect their love and keep Lindo safe from harm. Near dawn, Lindo tearfully proposed was possible solution, provided Ted really was convinced 318 the GIA was not the protector of freedom that Ted had once thought it to be. Ted agreed immediately to meet with "a friend" that Lindo had met through her charity work who "might" for able to help.

Ted knew exactly what he was doing when Linda's friend turned out as he a known KGR agent working out of the local Soviet Embassy. The KGB officer cheerfully admitted to Ted that it had been his side that had slipped him the documentation. He assured Ted that CIA security officers knew nothing about Linda's past and that they would not find out, considers of what Ted might decide to do. However, if Ted chose to cooperate with the KGB, then Ted and Linda might live a very happy and well-rewarded life, one in which neither would have to keep secrets hidden from the other, as Linda had been forced to do because of her fear that she would lose Ted if he knew about her past.

Afterdy convinced that socialism was the hope of the future. Ted compared himself to the German who opposed Hider and the Nazis but not the German homeland, and he agreed to the KGB man's proposal as make a deal in which Ted would be well paid for information be would pass to the KGB.

lied might have gone in to become another Rick Ames, working his way into promotions that would have made him a valuable mole for the Soviets. But Ted's had luck held, and for once the CIA's counterespionage system worked like it was supposed as A year after he started spying, an alert polygraph archnician decided Ted was lying during his regularly scheduled polygraph session. At about the same time, one of Ted's colleagues in Peru successfully recruited a spy inside the Sendero Luminoso, and Linda's name ramed up to some 10. his reporting. CLA security officers put Ted under elise surveillance and soon arranged a sup back in the United States for what Ted was told would be a training assignment. Once they had Ted and Linda back in the States, the CIA counterintelligence officers planned to arrest Ted and Linda and charge them with spying.

Two nights before Ted and Linda were scheduled as its us Washington, neither of them apparently aware that they were under suspicion, a mick slammed into their vehicle while they were driving home from an embasis enckard party. The driver of the stolen truck fled the scene and was never apprehended. Linda was killed instantly. Ted survived for three days of interrogation in a drug-fogged, semiconscious state,

The CIA damage report concluded that Ted had not been spying for the KGB long enough in pass on anything are was tactical intelligence information. The same report 3000 concluded that Linds had been working with the KGB from the very beginning, that Ted had been identified by KGB intelligence officers as a potential recruit, and the Linda last been specifically charged with the recruitment El led It's possible that the KGB somehow learned that Ted was under suspicion and arranged the arm accident at onevent the oubfill exposure of Ted as a Soviet spy, perhaps in order to protect a more important mole already working for the Soviets inside the CIA-on doubt the same person who alened the KGB that CIA security was me to Ted. It's also possible that it must nothing but a drunk driver causing an accident.

Even when he was disenchanted and discouraged about his career in IIII CLA. Ted Brennan never considered IIII possibility of turning troptor until the night Linda suggested Real might be the only way they could stay together. If the KGB not deliberately set out as recruit him. Ted probably would have eventually quit the CIA and taken me a new career. It's possible that he might have turned renegate like Philip Agee, who also decided that socialism was the hope of the new world and who wrote Inside the Company: CIA Diary, expose in which he named numerous CIA officers working. as Latin America. But it is just as likely that Ted would have faded men the night and spent the test of his life just as unfurphy will a career in business or the international charity industry as he had been with intelligence.

Long before that night when Linda suggested a way for them to be together, KGB intelligence officers had develuped an elaborate plan that played up the character weakmeans they had identified in Ted, Linds had probably been on the KGB payroll as an access agent for years will may have been the person who first identified Ted as a potential recrisit. No doubt she received considerable training on how to manupolate a man line Ted, and as she led him from easyai friendship and senious rumance, a KGB case officer closeis monitored her progress.

One might ask why a woman like Linds would agree to play the seduce: If a man she neither liked not respected. cases to the point of marrying him and perhaps bearing his children. The answer might be found in 100 general plight of intelligent feet poor women born in any third-world country. The with offered a young female university student a way out of priverry, a chance to enjoy an American life-style, and the emomonal reward of believing the was up the right side of history. Linda's surv is as old as that of Delilah. She may even have eventually convinced herself that she mily loved Ted.

Intelligence case officers consider recruitments like Ted Brennan the episome of success in the intelligence game, especially since such people already know the way the game is played As Victor Ostrovsky, the ex-Mossad case officer. explained, "The idea of recruitment is all rolling a rock newn a hill . . . you take somebody and get him gradually = de something illegal or immorat. You push him down the hill. We didn't blackmail people. We didn't have to. We manipulared them."

Employing techniques like those used an Ted is emisidered the best possible way in get a spy in the right place in the right time. Such recruitments allow the intelligence officer to focus on the specific agency or installation where the best information can be found and then to identify someone already in place who might its approached and recruited.

Recruiting someone who is in the right place at the right time is is the preferred method of obtaining spies, but in the real world it is manulways possible, indeed, misst government security and counterintelligence agencies are well aware of how spies are recruited and apend a lot of time and effort educating people with security clearances about the methods used by other intelligence agencies, as well as watching for hostile recruitment efforts.

On the other hand, the general public at for the most proignorant of the methods and by case agents at recture spics.

Therefore, and citizen who are one to recent spics working hid a business competitor, union organization, citizen's pomines group, or even government agency that would make not be the target of a foreign intelligence effort will find much casier targets.

The Art of Deception

"By Way of Deception Thou Shatt Do War."

-Morto III the Mussad

Recruiting spies is all about deception. The person who spies on his country, employer, friend, or lover engages in a constant deception, pretending to something he is not—a loyal, honest, trustworthy individual.

The deception doesn't end or even begin with the spy trying to steel secrets. The spy may be as thoroughly deceived by the person who rectuited him as the victim of the spy is deceived by the spy.

The spy, the case officer who recruited him, and the conficer's employer may be deceived by the intended victim who is deliberately supplying false information that will lead the enemy into a deadly gap.

The parameter who wants the game of spying will be the perturn who is best so deceiving others while at the same time being brutally frank with himself in order to avoid selfdeception. Those who practice self-deception will be the biggest losers of all.

ENCOURAGING SELF-DECEPTION: THE KEY TO RECRUITING SPIES

Everyone wants to think that he is a good person, doing whatever it is he does for the noblest of ideals. Some of the most notorious traitors in history—Benedict Arnold, Simon Girty, Vidkun Quisling, Tokvo Rose, and the Rosenbergs—all thought they were doing nuble things. Others, such as the Walker family, Rick Ames, and Riebard W. Miller, knew was what they were doing was treason, but they still deceived themselves into believing that they were not doing such a manual than their sins were justified by their own circumstant and the failure of their supervisors and colleagues to recognize and reward their worth.

The professional intelligence case officer or any private citizen who would recruit a spy must understand the human need for self-justification and be ready to offer believable excuses that the recruit can use for self-deception.

The successful man officer understands the human need for love, friendship, self-respect, and honor, and he will feed those needs as he coares a potential recruit into turning trantor. He also understands had plays to all the human weaknesses—greed, anger, envy, sexual deare, and even the fear of God. Like a clever con unum he will after to satisfy the human weaknesses while providing the self-justification had allows the recruit to delude himself into believing he is not giving up self-respect and honor.

A good intelligence case officer is someone who would make a good can artist, the kind of person who can call an old lady on the phone and convince her that he is a man person who wants to be her friend; that she has just won a big prize, but that she must first pay the "gift tax." He will have no remorse in pity for the victim, a person he considers in be a feel, created by God to be cheated.

Most people must be conned into becoming spies. The case officer may have ■ convince a recruit that he will be spying to bring about world peace when, in fact, the purloined information will be used to win a war. Another recent may be conned into thinking he is giving secrets to the CIA when they will be going to the KGB.

Those who must and manage spies must convince others that they are honest, sincere friends who are only interested in helping the potential regrot solve some problem in his life or win some unexpected reward.

The case officer who intends to rectuit and manage spies must practice deception as an art form and a way of life. He must learn to convince others he we something very different from what he really is. He must be able to assume a new identity, spin tales that sound believable, and create an imaginary world that the potential recent will accept as reality.

Learning to tell believable has is not something that everyone and do But anyone who wishes to engage in expiousge must learn in tell has in a way that makes others and only believe them to be true, but to believe them so totally that they will willingly must their reputations and even their lives on the perceived truth.

Not all people can pull the usua use. A good con always works because it fits the personalities of the con artist and the "mark." Anyone directing in intelligence-collection operation must recognize the differences in personalities that can be played against each other. A good case officer must not only be good at deception, he must also be matched to his target and play the rule that fits and target's expectations of whom he said tous.

Good deception, as practiced by the clever intelligence case officer, must combine the skills of a fiction writer with those of an actor. The crafty deceiver must be able to think up a clever III and then act the the fie as if it were reality. He must be able to adopt and fit into a culture much different item his narrive culture and play the role as if a were his teal life. This is a skill that must be continually practiced. Intelligence agencies dedicate much of the training of the prospective case officer to lying.

How It Works in the Real World

Let's take a book at an example of what we mean when we say that deception is the key to recruiting spies.

Itvin Silverman was a British citizen working as a young bureaucrat to the littish Admiralty office that reviewed satellite, signal, and human resource intelligence on the Middle East. Irvin was Jewish, and at one time during his college days he had seriously considered inunigration to Israel. He and his wife, Rachel, often talked about this possibility, perhaps after he retired.

Irvin saw no conflict in his sworn loyalty to the must and his emotional loyalty to funci, because British foreign policy was generally favorable to Israel. Even so, Irvin was occasionally troubled when he saw intelligence documents with information he thought should be shared with the Israeli Embassy but which carried and restriction that the information could not be shared with any other government.

Several mean after starting work for the British government, livin and Rachel mer Hum Hammer while attending a charity dinner to raise foods to support resettlement projects in Israel. Haim Flammer was a likable Israeli businessman about the same age as Irvin and Rachel, and they soon became good friends. Haim would too the Silvermans every time he visited London. Irvin and Rachel especially enjoyed listening to Haim's descriptions of life in Israel.

One evening Plaim complained that while the British government talked a good line, the British Foreign Office often took a less friendly stance at the working level and sometimes failed to pass on critical intelligence to the Israeli government. When Irvin asked Haim how a businessman could know what the Israeli government mas getting, Haim answered that besides his business duties, he was a representative ill a private group of Jewish citizens spread around the world who helped Jews and Israel in the continued fight for national survival. He assured the Silvermans that he indeed would know whether or not the Israeli government was seeing any specific piece of intelligence, especially intelligence on Arab terrornant and Palestinian plans for action. He shen suggested that Irvin night want an put the claim so a challenge by describing means bit of sensitive intelligence so that Haim could determent whether as and the information had been passed to the Israeli government.

The Silvermans, fascinated with the una information in their friend, Bill lots of questions, and the three of them talked late into the night about Israeli hopes and the committee commitment of many Arab political groups to the total destruction of the Jewish assume. The more they talked, the mare Irvin was inclined in accept the challenge to test Haim's claim that much of the intelligence information Irvin saw cross his deak was not being passed on to the Israeli government, apparently because of anti-Jewish sentiment in the Borish Foreign Office.

Over the next several weeks, livin picked out several bits of intelligence that crossed his desk and discussed them with Hairi. He was horrified when Hairi informed him that the Israeli government had not seen a couple of the reports that the living contain critical intelligence information.

Angre about the duplicity of his own government, neither from nor his wife Rachel even considered the fact that what blaim next proposed would be treason—that levin regularly goes copies of secret messages to Haim, who would then pass them on to appropriate officers of the Israeli government, indeed, Irvin 333 Rachel would have argued that the never named anti-Israeli buteaucrats in the Foreign Office were the ones committing treason by refusing to support what was supposed to up note-Israeli foreign policy.

In the months following from's recruitment, It's in and Rachel would tell each other in their private conversations that Haim's offer to pay for the stolen information had played an tole in their decision to help Israel. Even so, the payments quickly built a nest egg that made it possible for Rachel as start the next generation of Silvermans. Once the new haby came, they found themselves increasingly depend dont on Haim's rash payments for what they had come to consider necessities.

When Rachel expressed arms in about what would happen if Irvin was caught stealing documents, Hairn assured them that the Israeli government would help them avoid proscention. To ease Rachel's fears, he gave them detailed instruction on how they should go to the Israeli Embassy in London at the first indication that anyone was suspictions of them Hairn guaranteed that, if necessary, the Israeli government would smuggle the whole family out of England and into Israel where they would be relocated as heroes of the Jewish nation.

Soon after Irvin entered his fourth year of making for larget, he arrived at work to discover use M15 security officers waiting to interview him about their suspictions that Irvin was making illegal copies of British intelligence documents and passing them on to a third party. Irvin denied the accusation and then interted that he wanted to teek legal advice before answering any more questions. The security officers agreed that might be a good idea and scheduled a second meeting for later in the day.

As some as the counterintelligence officers left his office, Irvin left the building, found a public telephone, and called home. Hysterically, Rachel related that four uniformed poticemen and two men carrying M15 identification has urrived at their door carrying transit waterints while Irvin was being interviewed in his office. It had been pure lock that the policement found nothing as their search. The evening before, Irvin had left a load of materials at a drop sight for later pickup by Harm Otherwise, the policemen would have found the material trail tryin had been hiding in 185 home for the past several days.

Convinced that his arrest was imminent, Irvin instructed Rachel to take their two-year-old daughter and aroun him and the steps of the Israeli Embassy where they would activate the escape plan that Haim had taid our for them so many munths before.

Smiling at each other and looking forward to a new life in Israel, the Silvermans were holding hands and Irvin was currying the baby as they approached the embassy receptionist and Irvin spoke the code phrase that Haim had given him in memorize.

Irvin and Rachel thus begun a tour through helt. The memorized phrase not only brought no response from the receptionist, the embassy security officer who finally appeared to talk to them intuited that the embassy had no record of Irvin performing any service for the Israeli government and then ordered the Silvermans to immediately leave the embassy cumpound.

Back at their home, Livin worked the telephone while Rachel sat holding the haby, trying not to cry heiself as the haby hawled. First, Irvin tried to get through by telephone to sumeone at the Israeli Embassy who might be more sympathere to their plight; then he tried calling the different numbers fisted on Hammer's business cards at his home and place of business in liquel. In each case the person who answered identified himself as an employee of Mr. Hammer, explained that Mr. Hammer wasn't to the city and promised to pass a message to him as seem as possible. Finally, in desperation, In in called the emergency number in Jerusalem that Claim had nince written down and handed to levin along with misiguetions that Irvin and the number only in the direct of circumstances. The person who answered on the other end claimed to be a refrigerator repairman who knew nothing about what (rvin was talking about. When Irvin ried the other numbers again, no one answered the phones.

Not knowing what Fit to do, Irvin called a solicitur and went back to the office for the scheduled accord interview with the counterintelligence officers. Irvin realized for the first time just how much mouble he was in when one of the officers showed firvin and his solicitor a picture of Haim Hammer and asked fi from knew the num in the picture. When from hexitated in answering, the examiner again asked the question, this time giving the picture a name. Rashid Yasin, and identifying him as a suspected Syrian intelligence agent.

All the years that Irvin thought he was spying for a private Jewish organization supporting Israel, he must instead passing documents to an intelligence case officer working for a Syrian intelligence agency.

The British government, which doesn't fill admitting its failures, opted not to prosecute the Silvermans through the courts or make any public accurations. (It probably would have done so if the officers had found the secret documents that they had hoped to find at the Silvermans' home.) However, Irvin was dismissed from government service Irvin and Rachel did try to immigrate to Israel, but the British had shared the information on what Irvin had probably passed to the Syrians with Israeli intelligence, and an Israeli Embissy employee fold Irvin that the Israeli government might decide in prosecute Irvin for treason if $\mathbb{E}\mathbb{E}\text{ ever entered Israel.}

The False Flag

The man whom the Silverman's knew as Haim Hammer was a System intelligence case officer who had been using a false flag, some of the most important tricks of well intelligence trade used in recruiting spies. Rashid Yasin had been born in Israel but to Arab parents. Recruited as a young man into the Syrian security service, he had spent years perfecting the act that entrapped the Silvermans.

When using a false flag to espionage work, the case officer claims to hold a nationality or be a person whom the target for recruitment will expect to an friendly to Bill target's own interests. Every intelligence agency in the world man false flag deception in recruiting spies. A Chinese businessman in Singapore thinks he's working for the Republic of China when he is really approp for Taiwan. A student in Lima thinks he's passing documents to a man from the Cuban Embassy, who is actually a CIA case officer, who was born and raised in Laredo, Texas.

Occasionally, inrelligence case officers do identify themselves truthfully to prospective recruits. There are lots of people around the world who would love to work for the Americans and others who would do the seem for the Soviets, Cubans. But israelis. However, even in those situations in which a recruiting officer flies the flag of his true nationality, the initial approach will usually be made by a case officer working under a false identity of some kind. Then, if something goes wrong, the case officer um disappear without a trace.

Although me one collects any statistics on this, the majority of all spies think they are reporting to a different government, political group, meanmercial enterprise than the one really reading the information they steel. In spies such cases, they would have never agreed to spy for the CIA, KGB, or whoever trapped them into spying. Without the use of the false flag, very little spying would ever get done. The only spies available for recrustment would be political true believers and most traitest willing to sell use to the highest bidder, no matter who that might be

The false flag serves two purposes. First, as with the same of Invin Silverman, it was the cooperation of a target who might well prefer death to working for the test spy master who will benefit from the traitorous set. Second, it protects the rate officer to the event the target refittes to cooperate and reports the attempt to the superiors of a later cought in the act of spying.

Oftentimes, spies who are captured continue as insist that they were working for the organization they thought recruited them long after the false flag has been exposed as a fraud. (The Silvermans still believe that they were spying for brack and that the claim that Haim was a Syrian spy was a Mossad-inspired suse to hide their activities in Great Britain from the British. They considered themselves in Jewish circums whose reputations and economic futures were specificed on the hattlefield of intelligence collection.)

Because of the security advantages of working a reemitment under the cover of a fake identity, almost all case officers claim a false identity and carry the credentials to support that identity when they approach an individual with the intent of recruiting him is a spy.

Choosing the False Flag

Every attempt to retruit a spy is different, depending on the personality of the spy, the organization imporson in be spled on, and the attention under which the spy will operate. A key step in every recruitment in deciding what false flag should be used or, indeed, if any false flag is needed in all.

The false flag users be designed to fit the personality of the person targeted for recruitment and the situation in which the recruitment takes place. The recruiting case officer thould represent himself as a person the target will personal lave, or fear.

Sometimes, a false flag character can include all of those things. For example, the recruiting case officer working for a women's rights activist group approaches a devout Catholic working in a government agency that was targeted by the group. The manners protends to be a priest, perhaps a representative of the bishop was papel appear. The fake priest might claim that the church's interest in the passent is the result of the agency's active support for international birth-control programs using U.S. funds. In fact, the private task officer hopes to gain information that can be used in a publicity campaign criticizing Catholic influence on public policy on birth-control issues.

Pretending to be an authority figure, preferably a feared one, often works well. The recruiting officer might claim to be a special agent of the IRS on the state son board when approaching the employee of a private company. Another play is on claim to be a private investigator on private contractor working for a police on regulatory agency.

On the other hand, if the subject targeted for recruitment is someone who doesn't like authority, then a case officer might choose the cover of being an investigative reporter out to reveal the secrets the agency is trying to hide from the public.

One successful entrepreneur who collected corporate intelligence claimed to be the inventor of an arcane rechnical improvement in telecommunications equipment. He explained to anyone who distened that the invention had made him so rich that he no longer had to work at a full-time job, but instead traveled around the world looking for interesting investment opportunities.

The recruiter should not only pick a fake identity that will appeal to the personality of the target, but one that will justify some interest in the subject of that intelligence-collection effort. The homely secretary of a corporate president might get suspicious if her brand-new boyfriend, who claimed at $25 an interior decreator, suddenly starts asking about a construction project in Liberia, but not if he had told her soon after they mer that he is a civil engineer (as he talks about the bridge he once helped construct in Ecuador).

Remember that the laise flag is only one part of the story. A pretty young blonde who meets an embassy official in Paris the lonely man she is employed by a German industrialist to look for foreign investment opportunities. As she and the embassy official become lovers, he never suspects that she is really working for the KGB. Yet both the tale of her search for the extinent opportunities and the lovemaking were part of a carefully thought-out plan designed to recruit the diplomat as 4 509.

Deception can even be beneficial when an attempt to recruit a spy fails. If the target goes straight to his security officer in report an attempt at tecruiting him to be a spy, he will also carry the tale of the false flag and thus divert attention away from the true identity and intermoss of the case officer.

For example, intelligence officer working for a private business approaches a prospective recruit and claims to be working for the IRS, which would pay a large reward for cut-min information about the recruit's employer. Instead, the honest employee tells the boss about the attempt. As a result, the target may no longer be such a strong competitor because he's worried too much about an IRS tovestigation into his financial affairs.

THREE STEPS TO TELLING BELIEVABLE LIES

Everyone lies. It is the most human of all human and But some people lie better than others, and the person who recruits spies had better be the best. There are three steps to relling believable lies.

1) Create a well-thought-out story. 2) Set up the necessary props at make the story appear true. 5) Step on the stage and perform the part to well that those listening terms to believe the story in mass.

Creating a Good Story

Professional case officers call a cover story the lignal. Like all good stories, a legend most have several elements

1) It must contain a lot of truth. Rashid Yearn/Harm Hammer knew everything there was to know about the operations of various international Jewish groups. He knew how they operated, and he knew that they often tecruited Jewis in place, including such publicized manners as Est Jonathan J. Pollard case in the United States, in which a Jewish organization did indeed tecruit in American Jew, who then stale and passed on a collection of intelligence documents.

Keep the lying part of the story to the absolute minimum necessary to achieve the deception. Dun't add unnecessary detail that will be difficult to remember and don't alsborate when not required. When someone introduces himself in a doctor at a cocktail party, he doesn't list his qualifications, education, and experience Indeed, he was be extremely reluctant to talk about his specialty, having too often been approached by strangers who want a little free medical advice.

Nevertheless, the half must be ready to add additional details if questioned by someone who is serious or maybe naturally suspicious. When challenged, the trained liar keeps the answers to such challenges as short and to the point as possible. Rather than talking about himself, he asks questions and man to get others on talk about themselves, their experiences, and their thoughts. The con artist gives the impression of listening sympatheneally.

2) The first must be familiar with the background supporting the man. He shouldn't pretend to be a brain surgeon if he doesn't throw the difference between a hemostat and hemoglobin. Bashid hasin knew as much about larged as any native (a Jew born in larged) both and raised near Jerusalem. He also sum thoroughly be although with Jewish resignous practices, and he had practiced his deception in dozens of different synagogues to England. When he talked about life in Israel, he aprinkled his conversations with details of streets, stores, markets, rhesters, and holy sports that any testions of Israel would recognize. He dropped names of the first and movie stars and talked about family days celebrating the Featr of the Passover.

The mary must give the target some reason to make to listen and believe. The lie might appeal to but rarger's projudices or his corrosity, offer solutions to his fears and personal problems—suggest the possibility of profit.

4) The her in the story must be both internally and externally consistent and well thought out. The teller can't talk at one point about an old must be owns and then later mention the new Ford in three In the same way, he should check weather records before talking about getting caught in the rain on the seemed a murday last May.

5) Good fies take advantage of recent exerts. When mahs raidin the U.S. Embassy in Taipei, Taiwan, the Soviets soon thereofter released several documents through front arganizations that claimed to be U.S. server communications stolen by the mob. Those documents discussed the U.S. government's intention on abundon Chizag Kai-shek, a total prevariention.

When running a deteption, a case officer most plan for every possible reaction by the target. He must know exactly what he had do no matter how and target reacts. He identifies the worst possible case scenario, then plans out a response for every objection, question, or doubt that the target might taise. Once he has the details planned out, he goes over them numerous omes before meeting with the target. The better he knows the part he will play, the less likely he will make a mistake.

At the same time, a deceiver must not get so commuted to a story that he can not take advantage of new developments or incidents. A good deception plan anticipates almost every chaotic event that might happen. A good lie always starts with a prepared script, but unlike the stage, the liar must be prepared in rewrite the script at such point in the telling.

Setting Up the Props.

Every actor needs minimum, background scenery, props, and people who will support his tole It's true that a good actor can sound almost believable just by the way he reads a script, but in expronuge, almost is never good enough. The basic props that every case officer needs include such things as documents that support various identifies; rented offices with computers, faxes, and phones that will fill answered as if they were as a legitimate business office; the right kind of ear to go with the story; and the clothes, luggage, briefcases, and personal items that fir the character being played.

The documentation that supports the fake identity can be as complex as a passport, a Social Security eard, a driver's license, credit cards, and a complete set of supporting papers such as graduation degrees and professional licenses. In other situations it need not ill anything more elaborate itself a few business cards and a wallet with a couple of fake ID eards.

There are a number of books on the marker detailing the intricacies of false identities, and the would-be case officer should familiarize himself with the literature and falls do whatever is necessary to build a collection of identities that the personality of the case officer and fall stand up to examination. A commercial printer can print a collection of business

The person who sets out to recruit a spy in the local union will are need the same kinds of documents that a case officer attempting to cross a border with a fake passport would need. For most private intelligence officers, a good computer and a color printer should suffice for producing all the discumentation needed as convince a target that a person is really what he claims as be.

Americans generally accept people for what they say they are, provided they look the part and speak the language. The only time anyone shows identification is when he writes a check, uses a credit card, or is stopped by a traffic cop. Even when someone flashes the credentials of a police officer, a health inspector, or an IRS agent, the target of the investigation seldom takes the time to examine the budge and the ID card closely. Documents that will pass such scription are examined activities.

The background scenery and the support action should has well-prepared in the costume and the props. Rashid Yasin/Haim Hammer didn't just carry a fake Israeli passport and a dever's livense listing an address in Jerusalem; if somewar had called at the address, a woman claiming to be the moid left in charge of the house while Mr. Hammer traveled in England would have opened the door A call to one of the telephone numbers listed on Hammer's business card was answered by an office secretary maximum to help aim a possible customer. There was even a propriate ready in pull the contain closed: the refrigerator repairman on the inher end of the emergency number knew as soon as Silverman identified himsulf that something had gone seriously wrong. He immediately notified Reshid Yasin and his supporting can be the operation had been blown and that they should all disappear.

Performing the Part

The art of deception is an important to successful espionage that anyone who intends to make spies must study and practice deception with the same dedication that an interdemonstrates in his chosen profession Indeed, I've known several very successful case officers who mak part at another drama productions so that they could get practice in playing a rule with any make. One of the reasons why Rick Ames may have availed detection for so long, even passing GIA polygraph exams, is that he studied drama in college and even considered a career as an actor before joining the GIA.

All actors are fishs. They are not tiple in time with the woman, they don't really want to kill the other goy; they are not real cops or mibbers. In the same way, all successful hars an good actors. If they claim as be cops, they act and talk like cops would act. The acting it often even more important in a good lie than the other props.

The case officer is always on the meets with any recruit or potential recruit. As with any actor, the case officer may be playing more that one tole as he moves from meeting one recruit to another. He must be always to switch toles with the case he changes shirts. He can never allow a sample to eaten him out of character, in spite of the fact that he may be running an entire rung of spies. The shall one knows him as a different person

Chapter Seven

Exercises in Deception and Intelligence Collection

o state memorises his lines and then speaks them no the stage for the first time on the right the play opens. Just like the actor reheases on stage while there is no sudience in the theater to boo line, the person who intends to commit sessions deception must first practice in situations in which there are no personal risks. However, unlike the actor who teheases with other actors, the person who wants to recruit spies should practice his deceptive skills in the seal world with real people.

The goal of the exercises described below in to leath how to approach a perfect stranger, introduce yourself with a plausible capitanation for why you want to meet him, present yourself as someone the stranger would want to know better, and then so; the scene so that you meet the stranger in a situation the which you have control. It must all be done while you presend to be an entirely different character than who you really are.

To practice doing this, approach strangers in such places is hotel lobbies, restaurants, bars, airports, churches, meeting rooms, libraries, grocery stores, roadside rest areas, and any other public places. Initiate a conversation or set a scene where the stranger initiates a conversation and then tell the stranger a view that he believes to be true. The ultimate goal of the exercise is to present yourself with a behevable false identity and then to use that identity in a way that gets the subject to reveal something personal, to perform some service for you, or in agree to a second meeting. At the end of the exercise, the stranger should be convinced that he had just met someone who is interesting, honest, and worth getting to know better.

PRACTICING DECEPTION IN LOW-RISK SITUATIONS

Finding unsuspecting people to practice deception on is an easy task in our society. Most Americans and to strangers every day, provided they appear to be honest utilizent going about their legisimate business of engaging in a popular recreation. We talk to the guy and the gal standing beside of at a business, the person sitting next to us an a plane, the lady waiting in or in a store, people sitting around us at a finite game, parrons in the har where we drink, skiers standing in line at the laft, and in hundreds of other situations. Such conversations may start with some inanc comment in the weather but often result in a lot of information being exchanged, especially if one party deliberately leads the commentation in that direction.

Engaging in a harmless deception with a stranger makes it caster from a psychological point of view because was don't have in worry about heing found out and then charged with a come. If a stranger you need as a sitplane accuses you of lying when you tell him you are a writer from some tabloid told at the checkout stand in grocery stores, it costs you nothing in grief. All you have to do is stup the conversation and think a bit about what made him suspect you were lying.

Don't worry about taking the a stranger's time Most people live deadly dull lives, and they are usually enthralled when given a chance to experience a vicanous adventure. They will love your tale of how you spent 10 years at a intrasionary in the Amazon, how you narrowly escaped being convicted of shurder, or how much you expect to carn from the and of your first novel.

Travel Opportunities

When traveling on a plane, train, in bus, board with several different versions of who you am and what you do for a trying or a good time. The stories should be worked out in detail, and you should have answers for any questions the tar am might ask. Indeed, it is a good idea to write down the details of each cover story. Stories might include a claim that you are employed in the amount industry, perhaps as a makeup artist or an assistant to a famous director, that you are a criminal-defense attorney with a long history of getting people off on technicalities; an investor who has made a fortune in a couple of stock deals, and you now spend your time traveling around looking for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detectore tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching for deserving people to help; a private detector to tearching to the people to help; a private detector to tearching to the people to help; a private detector to tearching to the people to tearching to the people to the people to tearching to the people to the people to the people to tearching to the people to the people to tearching to the people to the people to tearching to the people to tearching to the people to tearching

Once you have your states ready, pick a different one each time you start a new conversation with a new person and tell it as if it were the truth. Start each conversation by asking your smaller the usual polite queries about his destination, why he is going, etc. If possible, get the other person to talk about himself. That's usually easy to do. Talk about yourself (your legend) only when asked, and then somewhat refuetantly. The more the person talks, the more you will learn about him.

When you do talk about yourself, tailor your story to what you have already learned about the other person. If your seatment is a pretty, young, serious woman who is a business major at a small university, you might say that you work for a famous movie director. This could lead to questions about whether she has ever taken drama lessons or appeared in any plays. Ask for a name and an address where you might contact her for a possible screen test for a movie can will now be working on in which the director is looking for new, natural faces.

If your seatmate works for a large international corporation, tell the diplomation-leave story. Talk about a number of business opportunities in the country of your assignment, which no American seems interested in.

If the scatmate turns out as be a religious minister, cribe your experiences as a defense attorney and successfully defends criminals you know are guilty and often commit terrible crimes afterward. Pretend to be disillusioned and looking for a way to change your life. Throw as a few manners that suggest you've had some major personal problems too—perhaps marital strife or a techager who has me away from home.

If you are talking to a middle-aged school teacher, pull the detective story, molding it into something that would appear to the toucher, perhaps that you are trying to clear a high school principal accused of molesting a teenaged boy or so make down a school reacher who travels during the summer as a secret serial killer. If you use this last scenario, was to like the target as a source. This means you will have to place the investigation somewhere near where your searmant lives and hinld it was something that might touch his life. Invent evidence that make that the killer might all teaching to a school in his are not that the teenaged boy once went to a nearby school. Ask advice on how you might find out what teachers do during aummer variation. See if you can get the proper to agree to do some investigation for you—for good payment, at a serior.

Other possible identities could include a stock trader if you meet a small businessman; a father searching (or a lost child taken by the mother 12 man ago, if you meet arm grandmotherly type: a world traveler who's lived abroad for many years, including man spent as a Thai pail for drug trafficking, if you six man to a college student.

Whatever the cover, rise goal should be to get the target interested in what you are doing as first the might agree to help if you asked, You want the target to willingly give you his many address, and a telephone number where you could contact him for a follow-up. The stranger may ask for the same information from you: give him a false name, address, and phone number. It works even better if you carry several sets of business cards supporting each of the false identities you intend to use.

However the conversation goes, as soon you are alone, sit down and write out all the details of how the deception played out and everything you learned about the target of the deception. Make special part of what went right and what went wrong.

Lying in Church

Go to chorch in a nearby city where means knows you. Be friendly and polite to those sitting near you, but aim of shy, Sooner of later, the minister of someone in the congregation will name to talk. Explain how you haven't been in church for many years, but that you had a recent religious experience that made you ministed your previous agnostic beliefs and man you looking for answers. Don't volunteer it, but have a detailed story you can relate if asked, perhaps the death of a child, a senous illness, or an expenience as a victim of crime or a survivor of some natural disaster. Don't make the experience something ministedous; it should be more psychological or nature. As you talk to minima people in the congregation, learn as much as you can about them; where they work, how happy they minimum be with their lives, what different social cliques exist within the congregation, and minimum.

How many invitations to social functions, group meetings, or private discussion groups did you get? Whom might you approach if you were an insurance salesman, a man looking for romance, an someone looking for a source to recruit in she local city government? Look for individual quirks and potential character weaknesses that might be exploited should you decide to recruit someone as a 5py.

Looking for Business Information.

Go to a business office located in a building that overlooks a busy intersection. Tell the secretary that you are an insurance investigator looking for someone who might have seen a fender-bender than occurred several weeks earlier. Mention the possibility of a reward that will be paid as anyone who provides information leading to a witness. Give as few details about the accident as possible in your mitial query. It's probable someone will have witnessed some kind of accident during the previous several weeks. If that person gives the details first, you can pretend that what M saw is the accident that you are investigating. Get as much personal information as possible on the people in whom you talk.

If you find someone who is especially interested in the possibility of earning a minima fee, change stones, claiming that you are really investigating the high rate of workmap's compensation claims filed by the company and suggest that if the target can provide that kind of information, he might make even more money.

ADVANCED DECEPTION TRAINING

The person who intends to energe in any setimes espionage activity, regardless of the target, will want additional training in deception before actually beginning an intelligence operation. These advanced techniques are may introcent fun, at the practice situations above suggested. Even when they are not cross the line of legality, they muste tetaliation should the target be able to identify the turnientor. The wise person who uses practice exercises similar to those desembed below will travel to a distant circ where no one knows him, use public phones, and make any long-distance calls by charging the maen une of the phone credit cards that can be purchased from machines in supermarkets and similar places. He will be training not just in deception but in security movell.

Because these practice deceptions require taking legal tasks, they should not be engaged in by anyone who does not intend to take up spy recruitment as a profession or a personal necessity.

Some of these advanced training exercises require some supporting false documentation. How much [D is needed and how good it must be depends on the level of deception and the suphistication of the person being deceived. The following exercises assume that you will be carrying whatever documentation might be necessary to back up the deception.

Get Politically Active

Call an the manager of a bond policical campaign—the more important the office, and herrer. Using a false identity, claim to be a wealthy volunteer with lots of time on your hands and a sudden interest in politics. Or on hints that there might be quite a bit of money available—if the campaign manager can suggest ways to put the money into the campaign fund without violating federal election campaign laws. Put in several days of work at the headquarters, meeting an interest other campaign workers as possible and perhaps even the candidate. The goal is in learn as much information about the candidate's behavior by you am while working with the campaign.

Call a Newsman

Contact a newspaper reporter and claim to be a midlevel government official who has information on a major curruption scheme. (Use the current political squation to come up with a scenario that will make the reporter think he may have the next potential "Deep Throat" on the hook.) Describe the story in detail, providing "evidence" to manifer your listeness Suggest a secret meeting in which he will control the secunity scene. Ask how much the newspaper reporter will pay for the full package of evidence you have.

A Hotel Visit

Check into a botel with a fake identity, pay cash, and to us many people as possible in the fobby, at the desk, in the dining room, everywhere you can. Tell them all the same call tale—say, for example, that you are visiting the United States on your first vacation in several years after working for a long while as a unassionary in a foreign mann. During the stay, find out if arrangements can be made with any of the hotel staff for a prostitute to man as your arran and that much it will cost. If it's nor use expensive, order one, and when she appears, pay her fee (you don't have to actually have sex, unless you want to). Then try to get the prostitute to agree to spy on an important businessman or politician who lives in that city for you.

Using the phone of the hotel foom, pick several different businesses, professionals, and processes agencies from the vellow pages and call them. With the businesses, pretend to be a customer with a potential big order. With the grufessionals, try to find out if lawyers will quote fees over the phone. how easy it is to make an emergency appointment with a doctor, as how much free advice you can get by telling a good story. If you are a minus student of deception, you might pretend to be an IRS special agent initiating an investigation of the professional you are calling, or a policeman checking on recent patients who have been treated for a specific kind of injury ("We know the assailant suffered such an injury while attempting to commit rape") When calling a government agency, report that the business you work for implie be in violation of wherever laws and regulations that particular agency enforces; some might also pretend to be a salesman trying to ger an appointment with the purchasing agent as a customer asking for a ranidentification number in order to file with with see IRS invent a many that will amount a suspicious apartment dweller you are delivering a delivery from an unknown person. Possibilities include flowers sent enonymously or a package containing a small, inexpensive appliance along with a letter on business letterhead explaining that the addressee has been chosen at random for a pronvotional scheme. Iff queried, the deliveryman can explain that he has delivered several such packages around the city.) Whatever the story, you must leave behind someone who believes that he has received a legitimate delivery and will have no reason to call the police or building security officer.

Getting into a Stranger's Apartment

Gain cotry into a large apartment building by pretending to be a package-delivery service. Carrying a real package.

Once inside the building, figure out a way to gain entry into another apartment on a different floor. The cover story arms provide your a legitimate reason to be in the building and to request help from name and else inside the building. Cover stones might include a claim that must are a private detective investigating an amount of claim and looking for possible witnesses. A minimum worker trying to find out who this a certain kind of plumbases of ficating problem, or someone who just accidentally dropped a small borde of wine or soda pop and who would the to clean me the mess before leaving the building.

Gaining Entry to a Private Home

Pick a private home in a middle-class neighborhood and attempt to gain admittance. You might pretend to have cut trouble and ask to use the phone. If this sceneric, you should have a friend standing by a phone is ease the himenwher does the smart thing and leaves you outside while he calls the emergency number and provide. Your accomplice will answer the phone by identifying the number as the Acc Tow Service then any the expected questions about the address

Other introductions that might help you to be admitted man a stranger's house are pretending at he a missionary tremember to carry a Bible and a briefease full of religious tracts), a federal investigator doing a security clearance on someone who once fixed as the neighborhood, a political worker trying to get out the vote, someone collecting for a charity, or a person who once lived in the house of a child and wants to include in a bit of nostalgis. The more original and legend, and the better the legend fits the probable prejudices of the homeowner, the better possible change of getting in. Once in, learn is much about the family of the case can from possible prejudices observations and the casual conversations that follow.

All of the above exercises are only suggestions. Each person wishing to practice the art of deception should think up a series of exercises to maximize his strong points. The goal is to get comfortable in the art of lying while in low-risk mustions and then move a step at a time into higher-risk summons and you are ready to use your deception capabilities or full advantage in recruit others to areal valuable information for you

Chapter Eight

It's More Than Telling Lies

eception is not enough when it comes to fectorand and managing a spy. The good case officer must be a student of psychology, who understants the human psyche and flas the ability to interpret the amotions of another individual and respond to them with apparent sympathy.

BE THE BEST NEW FRIEND THE TARGET HAS

When various of con men are interviewed by a police officer they always say something like, "He was such a once man." Successful con artists and intelligence case officers was learn to see that note people. They pretend to be succerely interested in their target, they almost never get angry, and when they is, it's a cold-blooded, well-thought-out action designed to produce a specific behavioral response from the many They ask lots of personal questions (including a few the recruit can answer with a bit of bragging), are sympathetic (never judgmental), and always willing to listen.

A good case officer will use every personal advantage he brings to the contest. People with the physical advantages of youth and good looks will use their sexual properties at an intelligence tool in a manipulation that is as Italias the story of Samson and Delilah. An older, educated person will play on the tendency of most people to respect both age and learning A self-confident, military-style personality will use his charismatic ability to command obedience.

The most effective false that of this a beautiful woman in a handsume man who has "fallen madly in love" with the putential recruit. As with the girls of the Easy Come, such a recruiter can often learn the manual of the recruit without the recruit ever knowing he life become a sur-

In the same way, someone looking like the wise too many remind the target of an old grandfuther. A manual who looks like a TV lawyer can offer help and advice, and the motherly woman can win the must of the manual lady who workers about her two-year-old's tentrums or her teenager's facturation with drugs.

PERFECTING THE ART OF CONVERSATION

The intelligence sam officer must understand how to get people to talk while he listens. This skill is especially important when using people as inadvertent spies. Had now also notifical skill so the process of recruiting those who will eventually spy knowingly for the mass officer. The more the other person talks during any conversation, the more magne trying to gather information will learn and the less likely it is that the target will learn something that the intelligence collector doesn't want him to know. (A good case officer will never allow the target to learn anything about his same personality, real hopes, fears, or despairs, except when such information fits the false flag he is flying.)

Getting people to talk in much easier than most people realize. Almost everyone would rather talk than listen. Because of that human mait, man social conversations are games in which each side tries to maximize the percentage of man in which the or she does the talking. Few people really listen to what other people are saying. They are instead thinking ahead to what they will say when they next get a chance on take control of the conversation.

As a result, most people are hungry for someone who will listen to them. Both one arrives and good intelligence officers know this, and they deliberately feed that hunger. They not only listen, but pay rapt attention and ask questions that encourage the target to keep talking. The best intelligence officer is one 200 makes the target believe that both of them are important, smart, experienced, and elever, and that the target has something to say that is worth listening to.

Most people so enjoy an intelligent, attentive listener, thus they will be everything possible to keep the conversation going. Time and again, I've gotten people to tell me valuable intelligence information by paying them the compliment of listening to every word they say, even when what they are saying to of no interest to me. Even though they may start out with the intention of keeping certain secrets in themselves, as they glory in the experience of having a listener hang on every word, they will stan letting slip more and more information in in effort to get the listener to continue to listen to them. People will literally give one their same an exchange for continuing to listen to them talk.

I can't count the times I've been in long meetings in which I listened intently as my intelligence source talked about his family, personal expenences, theory of warfare, or political beliefs. Although I tearned nothing new, I listened with rapt attention, with my only responses being question or murmured agreements to demonstrate that I may listening that I shared his conclusions. Then, when I finally started on apologize for taking so much of the important man's time and suggested it was time for me to go, he would in that I stay a little longer. When I reluctantly settled back is my chair, he would launch into another monolugue in which he did and telling me the secret information I had hoped to get an of him.

One time in Vietnam when I was working as a U.S. civilian official, I interviewed an ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) figurement general on how the war man going on his sector. After spending more than two hours listening to him discuss has theories on the best may to fight the Manist maurgency-theories that were in mail disagreement with those of his U.S. military advisors—I applogized for taking so much of his valuable time and started to stand up so me good-bye. Apparently, I was the first American who had ever taken the time to fisten to him without stying to shout him down. He reached a hand our, grabbed my wrong and pulled my back down to my Millir. Then III launched mito a long description of a secret cudre assassination program that he and his menwere implementing without informing his U.S. military advisors, but which he claimed was decimating the Victoring cadre in the area.

As the described the program, what most fascinated was the reaction of his staff who had sat silently through the long meeting, but who were suddenly horrified to hear their general let an American in on their dirty secrets. One captain, the hrightest young officer is the group, managed to catch the general's eye to give him one of those glances that attempted to remind the general that he should perhaps to a hit same discreet. The poor captain and back an imperial glate that not only put him in his place, but warned him that the might around be back in the jungles patrolling for Vietcong ambushes.

What's funny is that when I reported can to me superiors what I had learned. I now told that the general that been feeding me a hunch of lies betatuse what he mas telling me contradicted by the intelligence collected by both army intelligence and CIA case officers. It was only three or four months later that the intelligence experts learned from their well-paid spics what I had learned from the general by paying him nothing more than a few compliments. By then, the ARVN general had been transferred to a dead-end job in Saigon at the instigation of a "ring knocker" (a West Point graduate) advices who complained to the U.S. command structure that the general was not following U.S. advice on how to fight the war,

THE RULES OF FRIENDLY INTERROGATION

- Never criticize the other person's religion, country, family, intelligence, education, an personal conduct. If he criticizes himself in mar of those areas, he sympathetic to his concerns and confessions, but don't agree with too much enthusiasm.
- If you disagree with something 500 other person says and conclude that you must make that point to keep your said credibility; ask questions that give him an opportunity to better explain his beliefs while jetting him understand there must 50 s difference of opinion. Let 8 on know by 100 way you ask the question that, although you may have doubts about his conclusions, you respect his opinion and want to understand why he believes in he does. Never attempt to use logic or page him into admitting he was wrong.
- 3. Answer the other person's questions quickly, simply, and disperts. Don't add details and don't anticipate or answer questions he doesn't ask. You man to get back to fetting him do the talking as man as possible.
- Always follow his question with a question of your own that gets him talking again
- If you must interrupt the other person, do so only mask a question that further expands what he is saying on a subject that interests you.
- 6. Don't hurry to reach the point of your interview. If possible, let him being up the subject in which you are most interested. Learn to lead the conversation by suggestion and casual references. If you do ask direct questions and the seems reluctant to answer, slip into another subject and pretend you really weren't that interested in the matter. Lead him back to the subject after you've softened him up a bit more.

7. Let him fill the silences. A silent break in the conversation makes most people nervous, and they feel compelled to fill it. Use that to your advantage. If the other person doesn't respond immediately to some statement or question, wait him our If you don't really want to respond to a question he fall taked, think about it a present. He may start talking again as fill the silence.

 Don't rell and unless you have already plotted them our as pure of a well-planned deception or as man of a easefully emitted around story.

Anyone who intends to engage in serious intelligence work should prience these rules in every convension he assist any net of circumstances. I recently bought a used car. While we writed for a minor repair on the car. It salesman and I stated talking By the time we signed the contracts. I knew a surprising amount of inside information about the used-car business and IIII personal life of the salesman.

The elever intelligence officer does me want to show the world how much he knows me how make he is; he wants no find out what other people know, how make they are, and what makes them tick.

TRADE RESOURCES

There are three things that every intelligence agency uses in build the spy's trust in and dependence on the man officer or its agents: money, drugs, and sex. The private intelligence officer must also have access to those three things in sufficient quantities to service the needs of the potential recruit. He must also develop techniques for using each of them in recruiting different personality types.

Cold, [[ard Cash

Money comes first because without money, you can't buy an or drugs. Recruiting spies can be a very expensive proposition of the only way a case officer can get the recruit's attention a by spending money. He will have to buy the propositions as fir the personality he is playing, pay for restaurants, entertainment, travel, hotel rooms, tental and, clothing, sethnical equipment, and a variety of personal services.

Sooner or later, will some officers will want to offer some payment for the information the recruit in providing. Even when the recruit is appeng for ideological reasons, the same officer will want to make payment for services rendered. Getting a recruit to accept money and preferably to sign a receipt stating to its received the money at the final step in any recruitment. Some recruits will agree to spy for the money; some will only accept money as a loan in an incidental reward.

Normally, money will come from those who finance the intelligence-collection activity Sometimes those who are collecting intelligence will find that they must self-finance the operation. This might include annigovernment groups intent on apying on government agencies as part of revolutionary activity Because many groups turn to such criminal activities as theft in finance their revolutions, collectors will find that the same techniques they are for recruiting resources can also be used to con unsuspecting people out of cold, hard cash. Such activities are almost always criminal found and are beyond the scope of this book.

Drugs.

("Candy is dandy, but liquor is quicker.")

The case officer can man a wide variety of drugs in many different ways as a sool for recruirment. If the target has a drug addition, the case officer might be able to turn that knowledge to blackmail him or be might offer to supply the addict with the drug of his choice as a way of making friends or even as a means of rewarding the recrust for services tendered, it may even be possible for the case officer of one of his agents to introduce the potential recruit to drugs and then encourage an addiction which the man officer can later use to his advantage.

Drugs can also sometimes be used as the greate for developing a subtle interrogation. There is a lot of truth in the old Larin expression in una territar ("in wine there is much"). The list of people who have let slip their darkest secrets after the before the dawn of history and totals in the millions.

Alcohol is always the drug of choice. It is legal in most countries around the world, readily available, and socially acceptable, it relaxes inhibitions, makes people careless, loosens tongues, and impairs judgment. Often the first approach that a case officer makes to a rarget will be in a surration in which alcohol is being served. Alcohol can be especially useful when dealing with an inadvertent apy—someone who will provide information without realizing he is dealing with and enemy

Although a case officer will frequently use alcohol and other drugs in dealing with rectains, he must control with his own drinking and the quantity of alcohol consumed his the target during any social occasion. The idea is to get the target inder the influence while maintaining your subtlety and without alcreing the target to what a happening. There are a number of different tricks of the trade and limiting one's own consumption while encouraging the nectuit to indulge more heavily.

Often, especially when dealing with people who have a drinking problem. If you have to do in allow nature in take its course. The drink will be man interested in filling his own glass than to making sore his man friend is matching burn drink for drink. Things ger more difficult when dealing with someone who expects that the person on the other side of the table will match him round for round. The tricks of the trade for ensuring that you stay soher while the target gess drunk occlude the following:

- Prior to a meeting that will include consumption of alcohol, cat a quantity of fathy food. For example, cat several pieces of bread heavily appear with botter or a pint of ice cream.
- Arrange with the bartender to control the drinks, mixing heavy dennes for the target and well-diluted drinks for you. (This is one argument for during your heavy drinking in a sesting in which you have the control, say a hotel room, a private home, a diplomane residence, or a bar where the owner or tracenders are on your payfull.)
- . Lett the clair to the light, but don't permally sig the drink.
- to come as the target's gloss is empty, order another round. Let the wanter take away your sull half-full or, better yet, almost full donth.
- Presending to be much drunker than you are, "accidentally" spill a full plant. You can then miss a round while deaning up the mess.

One of the most difficult tasks associated with the use of alcohol to a social situation is that you must still remember all list details of the meeting so that you can record everything the target savs once the meeting is done and aim have a chance to be alone. While the drinking goes on, you should use every break in conversation or moment at silence in an opportunity to mentally review the previous conversations and actions as a way of memorizing how you will eventually write the report of the meeting.

Illegal Drugs

Illegal drugs offer even greater opportunities for gaining psychological control of a targer than alcohol can, provided you can control the simprion. There are several ways in which you can use illegal drugs as an aid to recruitment:

- Build rapport with the target by supplying drugs to feed his addiction.
- Take advantage of his drug-induced state as gering information.
- Make the target's use of illegal drugs a reason for blackmail.
- Ger die earget hooked on drugs to make him more dependent on you.

The best situation is one in which the target is supplying but own drugs and you simply go along will the situation, taking advantage of developments as they occur.

However, in some structions you may have to play the tole of a supplier. You might even use the cover of pretending to be a drug dealer when approaching a known drug addier. The fact that the drugs and illegal makes the case officer and the manner tall recent instant co-conspirators of crime. This is turn, presents future opportunities for blackmed.

Illegal drugs are very much a dual-edged award. Although they can make the turget assess to control, they can also make him more careless at 10 goes about his spying. A person who uses illegal drugs is also at constant risk of being arrested and charged with drug offense and is notoriously outrustworthy when arrested. Most will immediately sell out their supplier and their friends. Also, an illegal drug user can be fired from any job at any time, especially it and employer randomly tests his employees for drug ubuse.

Another major problem with using drugs for recruiting is finding a supply. Case officers working for national spy agencies usually have access to all the itlegal drugs. Sometimes they are supplied by the intelligence agency, often from stocks confected as part of the government's narrowes-control operations. Sometimes a case officer will use a service agent he has recruited as a source for illegal drugs that can be used in recruiting new agents.

The private intelligence entrepreneut who is working without the protection of legal mans will have to consider the might result from the use of illegal drugs in a recruitment effort. Frankly, illegal drug use has become such a manager sense in modern America that intelligence entrepreneurs and private collectors should have little trouble in finding a source for the illegal drugs they may require for successfully recruiting spies. Even so, individuals who have an expendence in purchasing illegal drugs as no familiarity with the mean of the city where drugs are openly sold are better advised to look for other ways to subvert a parential spy rather than risk the real possibility of arrest that comes with seeking man a drug dealer.

Although government case officers will drink alcoholic beverages with a targer for recrumment, they will not those the illegal drag experience. Indeed, using illegal drags, even as part BL a cover story, is considered reason for serious disciplinary action by BER CIA and most other government intelliments secrecies.

With the possible exception of an occasional interprantational, private intelligence collectors are advised to follow the same practices. This is especially not when it comes to such temberals activities as sharing needles. When it comes to the same of illegal drugs by a potential recruit, the most important thing is that the recruiter appear sympathetic and nonjudgmental of the use of drugs, and not that he might be willing to that the drug experience.

Because El the major dangers of dealing and supplying drugs, or even being present in places where drugs are used, the case officer must always be operating index a false flag, and a well-constructed false identity.

Ser

Sex won't play a role in every recruitment, but it are make a critical difference in how successful many recruitments will be. In almost all times are it should not be the case officer who personally services the sexual desires of the recruit Indeed.

most national intelligence agencies, including the CIA prohibit case agents from engaging in sexual relations and any recruit (The exception in this rule may have been the old KGB. There are lots of rumors about and women who were specially trained in the art of seduction by the KGB.)

Instead of hedding a recruit, the case agent creates and finances a situation in which the recruit finds what he thinks in true love on maybe just many sexual pleasure than the potential recruit knew was possible. If the case agent capeers to use sex as part of his recruitment, he will have to also recruit a person who will willingly go to bed with the prospective recruit.

There are several different options for finding potential sex partners for the recent to enjoy

Taking Advantage of an Ongoing Affair

Presentiment surveillance will often uniover the existence of an illien sexual arrangement or a budding romance. Almost always, the sum officer can take advantage of such a situation, even when it is a legitimate romance. In the case of such a librar affair by a married target, there was usually instant opportunities for blackmail, but the elever case officer may instead choose to become a conspirator in the affair as part of building a relationship with the name. The case officer becomes the good friend who helps facilitate the rectuit's love life by providing excuses for the target's absence from family duties, perhaps a private place where the recruit can enjoy the lover's attention, or some an opportunity for a double date in which the sum officer picks us the cost of estensintment

There is always the possibility that a case officer intecruit the love interest in his own agent. This is frequently the case in long-term affairs between some mattred partner and an unmarried colleague. In such attuations the single partner is often dissatisfied with the hopeless nature of the relationship and can sometimes be manipulated into spying in the guy she realizes is never going to tell his wife for a divorce.

She may do a as a form of revenge, or she might be convinced that the final result of het perfidy will be a divorce, with her taking the old wife's place in the family mansion.

Obviously, homesexual relations, affairs with underage partners, in kinks sex involving sadism or other perversions an offer considerable apportunities to the case officer who may figure out how to manipulate the situation in his own idvantage. Remember that while blackmail is a powerful root, in works best iff the case officer is not the one making the blackmail threat, but rather the one who steps forward in provide an escape route for the target.

Prostitutes

The case si was so provide sex to a potential recent is to here a professional and then set it up in make what happens next appear to to a natural occurrence. A frequent play is now in which the case officer makes friends with the target and then invites that out for a night on the town. During she course if the exening, they meet a part of (tiendly women, who may agree to go back to the hotel or safe house where the case officer is supposedly living. How the case officer uses the incident and where it leads will depend on the personality of the potential recent, whether is not 10 in matried, and, if so, now much 10 mans to keep the manifeld a going concern.

In another ploy, the case officer haves the prostitute, briefs ser on what he wants done, and then arranges a thinner meeting between the prostitute and the target, with the amount that the arranger will never know that the shy, innocent girl he met man evening was in fact on experienced lady of the night.

Many higher paid call girls become very adept at acting out roles to situations where the beneficiary of her services is an helieve she insu innocent lover. Nevertheless, if a case officer intends to man a prostitute in this way, he had better give her several trial man to make sure she was be trusted to do what she is being paid to do. For example, the case officer might see up a test run with a service agent and then have the service agent report back on how well the call girl performed her role.

Once the potential traitor has enjoyed the services of the girl, or for that matter a homoseyual prostitute, there are several different ways to take advantage of the situation:

- The prostitute, who has been briefed by the person paying the bill, can probe for information much like the ladies of the Easy Come.
- The prestitute can do things that the target likes so much that he wants to make another date, and another, and then he becomes a regular customer. The potential recruit sum discovers will have me pastime is a very expensive limits and that he will have in find a new source of meome if he is to keep enjoying the pleasure.
- The prostitute plays on the targer's sympathy, perhaps spinning a rate of how she is entrapped by pumps but with only a little help from the target she might escape from her awful life (This works especially well if the prostitute tooks very young and innocent and the mann has little experience with professional min pariners.)
- A person claiming or be the prostiture's pump man or harres the target, perhaps or claiming that the target but the woman during sex and a demanding payment or be attempting blackmail
- The prostitute fakes an injury, a sudden illness, or even an accidental death during lovemaking, and the incident threatens to expose the target's activities for the eventug.

In each of the cases in which the target finds himself facing a problem, the man afficer will be the and who offers a solution.

Anyone who takes up the career of a professional intelligence officer should arrange to have several good proboth male and female, as cap. How he goes about finding such professionals depends on the country and city where he is opersting, that of the training of any good case officer should be learning the topes when is comes to finding a willing prostruce. The case officer will, of course, always make any contacts with professional was partners under a surray identity.

Using a Service Agent

Every good case officer will have several agents he has recruited to work for him, not for the intelligence they can sten but rather the services they may provide. This can include providing sexual services to them targeted for recruitment—provided the case officer can find nume attractive young person who is willing to make the easy sterifice for his country, the sexus, the polineal leader, or whotever other false flag the case officer is flying when he recruits the young person fric relatively man as find young men who will seduce a more to the good in their country or just a good paycheck in more rendered (even if she may not be much of a catch), but supportings a man officer can find females just as anything to do their our for their country or their political ideals.

The case agent uses the same techniques to recruit a volunteer sea pattner as the would for recruiting a primary agent. For example, a GIA case agent might recruit a young female college student in a northern European country by promising in help her get a work visa in the United States if she will first aduce the soo of the deputy prime minister. In another storage the case officer might convince a pretty tree hugger in bed in executive working with a logging company to get evidence that can be used in a law suit to halt clear-cutting. (The information will really be used by a competitor logger to undercut a bid for a Forest Service log sale.)

In the following example of using a service agent as a sexcal agent, Doug Kranz worked as an information specialist for a Washington lobbyist doing business with the transportation codnstry. Kranz was looking for a good spy inside the Interstate Commerce Commission and had identified Martha O'Conner, a secretary working in the office of a deputy commissioner, as a potential recruit. Kranz's surveillance had discovered that Martha occasionally went harhopping with a few female friends in the singles joints of Georgetown, but that the homely and overweight woman always went home alone, thereof her though her prettier friends often gor lucky.

For, 40, and hald, Kranz knew he was little chance as building any kind of personal relationship with Ms. O'Conner, however, he was another recruit rating in the wings, working for just this kind of a problem. Dick Ford, a graduate student at American University, knew Kranz as David Fraser, the executive director of the Air Quality Education Council, an environmental protection political action group supposedly based in Denver, Colorado, Kranz/Fraser explained to Dick Ford that his organization wanted better a was to the office where Martha O'Conner worked and would pay a substantial sum of money for such access. Dick, whose serious financial arraiss were about me force him to drop out of grad school, agreed to take in the job that the man he knew as David Fraser was offering

The next time Martha O'Conner went along with infriends on a tour of the Georgetewn bats, in was Martha who got lineky. At Kranz's instruction. David bedded Martha sexeral times over the next several weeks before taking the next step. When Martha was totally committed to him and the pleasure he was giving her. Dick rold Martha he was going to have to drop our of school and return to his home state because of his financial problems. He then mentioned one possibility that might keep him in town and in Martha's wall he had a friend working with an envisonmentalist group that would pay good money for a Hill of inside information Martha might provide.

Marths was soon hooked, and for the next two passed passed increasingly sensitive executive branch documents on to Dick, who passed them to the man he knew as Divid France. Both Martha and Dick believed that the information that Martha was stealing was helping an environmental group.

fight attacks on automobile pollution controls, when, in fact, Doug Kranz's boss was using the information in his lobbying efforts for the restrictive legislation and in recruiting new businesses by staring them with insider information on what new regulations were coming down the pike.

The Innucent Amoteur

If some saturations, the case officer might identify a potention have partner be introduces to the target, or arranges for the target to meet, that then let make its course. Once have develops, the take officer deliberately creates a situation that places the future of the lovert in respardy. Eventually he offers a solution, but the potential rectum must steal a few barriess documents first.

In the early 1960s, Czech intelligence officers succeeded in recruiting a U.S. diplomat stationed in Prague by using such a sechinger. The primary case officer, Jaroslav Parina, had identified the diplomat, Edwin Trickett, as a man with a rowing eye for the ladies. Trickett also had a wife with whom he often argued. Jaroslav found a pretty, young Czech woman, frateiere who had applied for an exit visa to visit a brother living in the United States. The Czech government had denied the visa, 186 usual practice in those Cold War days.

Jaroslav arranged a situation in which Patricic "accidentally" overheard two strangers talking in a library about how one way in get a Creek exit visa was to have someone from the U.S. Embassy contact the Creek government. One of the strangers mentioned that Edwin Trickett, the administrative others at the embassy, had done several such favors for pretry young women. The second stranger said he understood that only worked if the young minimum were willing to "do anything" in get a visa.

Patricic, who so badly wanted to escape life in Czechoslovakoa that she would indeed do anything, acted on the arrang she ked overheard. She called the U.S. Emhassy and asked for so appointment with Edwin Trickett, Trickett, who in truth had never traded incervention on a visa matter for sex, had an way of helping her and that was soil inteigued by the pretry Czech woman who seemed in anxious as do anything to get a visa. Rather than simply telling her she had that information, he promised he would try to find a semi in help her get the exit visa and suggested that they meet to a few days so he could report what the had found out.

Although he was initially suspicious about Patricie's metives, her innocent demeaner and adament criticism is the Czech socialist government soon convinced him that she really was what she claimed in El. They met several more times outside the embassy and eventually became lovers. After that, Trickert did aeriously start looking for ways in which he might help the young woman get out of the country. As his marrage was floundering he even began considering the possibility that he might divorce his wife and matry Patricie.

Eight weeks lame. Edwin was heading for a little afternoon delight with Particle when its new several policemen coming out of Patricle's apattment building, dragging Patricle with them. Terrified at what fill had witnessed and certain that his illicit romance was about as fill exposed. Edwin spent a miserable two days waiting for the second shoe as 180. On the 1800 day he received a call at his embassy office from someone calling himself Jiri, who claimed to be Patricle's uncle and who demanded a meeting with him.

When they met, the uncle inid Edwin that Patricic like been charged with spying for the Americans and that Edwin was going in be named in the intelligence officer who was best control officer. Jiri, who claimed in the an upper-level bureautrat in the Ministry of Industry, explained he had pulled a few strings and arranged to meet with his min in her cell. She had veheniently denied she was a spy the last admitted her affair with the U.S. diplomat. Jiri had pulled more surings and was hopeful that he could get the charges against the niece dropped, provided that Edwin was willing to meet with a Czech security officer and convince him that Edwin was not a CIA officer has a legisimate diplomat. If Edwin failed an consum the security officer of that, then Patricie would be tried as a spy. The Czech government would in declare Edwin persona non grass and expel him from the country. That, in most would expose Edwin's affair to his employer, co-workers, and family.

Edwin agreed to such a meeting. The security officer with whom he may were of assured Jaroslav Parma. Parma grilled Edwin for several bours about his work as an administrative officer in the U.S. Embassy. Edwin's embassy job was, in fact. a dull administrative job that had nothing to do with either policy or TE collection El intelligence.

As Parma listened to the diplomat talk about his daily drudgery. Parma became friendlier and friendlier, assuring Edwin that he believed what Edwin was saying. Over the next two weeks, Parma arranged for three more meetings so that 83 could gather more details, explaining that while he was convinced that Patricie was innocent, he still that to convince his superiors of that. Parma also warned Edwin that he should not tell anyone in the embrary about his problems, because that would only have it more difficult to arrange Patricie's eventual freedom—advice that Edwin man only too anxious to follow, Finally, in the third week, Parma arranged to allow Edwin to visit Parman in the pail.

Left alone with Patricie in her cell, Edwin listened to the terrified woman in she described her interrogation by the Uzech security police. Yet, is not though near hysteria, l'atricie pleaded in whispets with Edwin that he not do anything for the Uzech government. She insisted that Edwin forget he ever knew her and that he get out of the country as min as possible. Parnete's obviously uncere is min for Edwin and her willingness to sacrifice her own life only helped to consider Edwin that III must do everything possible to help the woman be lived.

Edwin left the jail absolutely certain that Patricie was an innocent victim, which in fact was true. In his meeting, with Parma, the Czech security officer assured Edwin that things were moving in the right direction. The only problem was that he needed something some as convince his superiors that Edwin non-sincerely trying to help the young Czech woman. He suggested that a would be very helpful if Edwin could provide a few embassy documents for Czech intelligence. Parma assured Edwin that the documents didn't have to be classified, but rather could so something as common as personnel and administrative manuals. Parma promised that with just a hit of epoperation, Edwin could solve both Patricle's legal problems and also avoid the caposure of his little inveneurer.

The next time he met with Parma, Edwin suck with him a complete set of U.S. State Department's administrative manuals. White they were marked Official Use Oah, they were typical histengeratic rules and regulations of personnel conduct and administrative procedures for letting contracts our for bid, algoing rental agreements, ordering supplies, running the embassy commissary, and himsg local employees.

Two days later, Jaroslav Parma told Edwin that Patricic had been released into her uncle's cutrody Parma warned Edwin that the case was still not closed and suggested that it might be necessary for Edwin to again demonstrate his willingness to cooperate with the Czech government Jaroslav promised that if Edwin would continue to cooperate until his tour in Prague was up, the Czech government would grant Patricie an exit visit, which would allow her to leave the country for the United States.

Edwin's wife had recently returned to the limited States for a vacation with her aging parents, so Edwin was able in spend Patricie's first night out of jail with her in her uncle's house. Once they were alone, Patricie again pleaded and Edwin to do nothing to help the Gzech government and to forget about her advice that Edwin refused to accept.

Happy to have Patricic free, and optimistic that he would succeed in eventually getting her out of Czechorlovakia, Edwin was an new mark for the next step in his recrumment. For the next several months, each time Edwin passed Parma a new set of documents, the new elassification stamped on the documents crept a little largher. White Edwin did not not mally have any marker as non classified and as pare of his job description, his responsibilities on the embassy administrative officer gave him new access to all sections of the embassy, including the classified document storage areas.

Who knows how long it would have gone on if Edwin had been a 20 more cautious. But the embassy security ufficer nited that Edwin was spending a lot of time in the classified-document storage vanit and got suspicious. He did a bit of police work, and Edwin got cought. Edwin was charged, convicted of treason, and sentenced to a long prison term of a federal penitentiary in the United States. No one on the U.S. side knows what happened to poor Patricie.

Chapter Nine

The Case Officer at Work

ct's take a look at a successful recruitment from start to finish, using an example that dates back to the Cold War when the new Communist government in Cuba sam expanding as influence in Latin America.

The CIA poticy stalk with the approval of the National Security Council determined in the mod-1960s and more information was needed on Cuba's subversive activities in Venezuela. The policy staff asked that the CIA station in Carseas identify and recruit someone working inside the Cuban Embassy in Carseas who might provide such information.

The CIA mation chief in Carners assigned a case officer, Harold Doyle, the responsibility and doing so. Doyle was already assured a surveillance operation on the Cuban Embassy out of an apartment building matter the street from the embassy. The surveillance had identified several Venezuelan nationals who worked in the embassy, including Tomasino Lopez, who worked as a cook in the embassy cafeteria.

Helena Chavez, a Venezuelan national, was working for Doyle as an access agent. Helena was a middle-class college dropout who was long been fascinated with American movies, fashious, and was. She had been working as an employee of the CIA for four parts. Although she considered it a good job with good pay, the work and gave her access to the US, male diplomats working in the embassy, one of whom she hoped might eventually fall in love with her and propose. Relena had some gone to the United States for four munths of CIA training and was regularly "fluttered" (polygraphed) to ensure her invalty to her employer

Helens approached Tomasins Lopez while the latter was attending mass and made friends with her. Helens learned that Tomasins never left the embassy kitchen while she may working and that she knew almost nothing about the Cuban nationals who worked in the embassy. Tomasina was not a good prospect for recruitment as either a minimal agent of an access agent

However, Helens also learned that Tomasins had an adult son, Jorge, who was desperately looking for work. Tomasins complained in her conversations with Helens that n and too had that Jorge wasn't a better driver because the Cuban Embassy was looking for a new chauffeur.

A surveillance of Jorge found him to he in desperate arrans indeed He owed money, his wife was about to produce their second child, and he had been blacklisted by a foreman of a U.S oil company where to once worked after he are been caught distributing pro-Castro propagands sheets to fellow workers. Helena arranged to meet Tomasina while she and her sim were walking together on the street and was thus introduced to Jorge.

A couple of days later. Helena "accidentally" bumped into Jorge in a crowded department and. Pretending to find Jorge an attractive male who interested her. Helena screpted Jorge's quick invitation in share a cafarite. After sounding him out during several subsequent meetings over coffee and anifying that he was ready to do about anything to eath money, she introduced Jorge to Harold Doyle, again in what appeared to be a chance encounter. Harold, using the name Brens Stoker, pretended to be a Canadian journalist who was writing for a leftist men magazine and who was looking for mining of U.S. imperialism to write about. Jorge was only too happy in spill his tale of woe about his misurestment at the hands of an American-owned company.

In appreciation of Jorge's contribution to the story he claimed to be writing, Harold paid for Jorge to take a week-long driver's education course, as the only student of a special tutor. As soon as Jorge finished the course, Tomasina asked her supervisor in the Cuban Embassy to help get Jorge the job as an embassy driver.

Once Jorge was working in the Cuban Embassy, Harold—or Brent Stoker as Jorge still knew him—suggested that Jorge could help him with a mem story, one crying to put a human face on the Cuban diplomat working in Venezuela. All Jorge would have to do mem report on what diplomats talked about whate tiding around in embassy cars. A promise to pay off Jorge's debts if the information proved useful entwinced Jorge that his could help the friendly journalist gather that kind of information without compromising his loyalry to his new employer. Joking that his Cuban employers might get suspinous of they saw Jorge meeting with a gringh, even a Canadian gringh, I land suggested that Jorge pass on whatever information he overheard to Helena.

One of limble's support agents rented an apartment in a tower-class housing man where Helena took an residence. Juge began visiting Helena once or twice I week for what would appear to anyone following him to be for romantic purposes. Helena, on her own initiative, began bedding Jorge during his visits in well in debriefing him while they showered together on what he IEE learned while working in the Cuban Embassy. After he left, Helena would write up the information and pass it on to the U.S. Embassy case officer.

Because he was earning two incomes and getting lots of sex on the side while his wife recovered from the birth of their second child, lorge didn't spent a whole lot of time worrying about the identity of the mysterious Canadian. While he learned nothing in immediate intelligence value in the job, he was learning a for about the Cuban diplomats, mostly by listening to the gossip of embassy wives he often drove on shopping excursions and enps to chariev events.

One of these wives. Dora Marrinez, was married to a first secretary in the Cuban Embassy, Silvestre Martinez. On several occasions Jorge drove Silvestre to parks and other public places where Silvestre would meet with Venezuelan students and other Venezuelans who appeared to be ordinary workmen. This activity suggested that Silvestre was working with student and labor groups. He would have exactly the kind of information that Hamild Doyle was hoping to collect.

Jurge also reputted through fielens that Silvestre Martinez was not getting along with his immediate supervisor and that the embassy gotsip was that Flora Mattinez was sleeping with the supervisor.

All this suggested that Silvestre Martinea might be recruited as a sps. if he was handled the right way. Harold Dovie, the station chief, and other CIA colleagues began to plan out how the approach would be made and agreed that Dovie would make the approach using the cover of a Canadian journalist.

Before they could inmate the plan, Jorge overheard two tensor Goban Embassy officials, one of whom was Silvestre's supervisor, discussing how they planned to transfer Silvestre Martinez back to Havana. One of the earcless diplomata about it slip that Silvestre's wife, who held an embassy position as a secretary, would remain in place in Caracas, at least for several months. Even Jorge could figure out that Silvestre was getting a career shaft to that the supervisor could have easy access to the wife.

Harold Doyle discussed the situation with the station chief, and after an exchange of telegrams with CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia, they decided they did not have enough time before Martinez's transfer back to Cuba to carry out the usual recruitment procedures, which can often take weeks or even months. Instead, Harold would try a cold pitch.

(Although seldom used as a recruitment technique and almost never successful, a cold pitch is a direct approach with no prorountset. Someone walks up to the potential recruit while he is a public place and makes an offer that, it is haped, the target will find too good to turn down.) A cold pitch is used only as a last tesort, but this did appear to he the kind of the in which there was no other choice, especially since none of the other diplomats in the Cuban Embassy offered likely prospects for recruitment.

Harold approached Silvestre Mattinez while they were both attending a National Day Party at the Mexican Embassy in Caracus. Catching Maninez alone for a moment in a roomful of people. Harold started the usual charter that makes up so much of the mane conversation at diplomatic entertainment functions. Halfway through the second sentence, when he was sure no last was listening, he dropped his voice to a whisper, moved his face closer to Martinez, and in a halfdozen short sentences made an offer. He let Marrinez know how much they know about him and about his wife's affair with his hoss-news that apparently Martinez suspected but didn't know for sure. Doyle then suggested that the best way Martinez could take revenge would be to accept me offer of a tump-sum payment of $20,000 and a regular income deposited in a Swiss bank account for passing on information to the Americans during the time Martiner still remained in Venezuela.

After Martinez returned to Havana he would become a U.S. mole inside the Cuban Ministry of Foreign Affairs. While Martinez spied for the Americans, his Swiss bank account would grow. Harold promised that after 10 years the CIA would smuggle Silvestic out of Cuba so he could enjoy his wealth on Miami.

Martinez must have already figured one what was happening to him and his careet and had been considering possible alternatives. He immediately rejected the suggestion that he was to Hayana as a mole and instead proposed that he defect, provided the Americans made a hump sum payment of $30,000 and set him up with a new identity is any American city he might choose. In return, Martinez would tell everything he knew about Cuhan foreign policy and propaganda efforts in Latin America. Martinez also insisted that there must be no public announcement of his defection. He wanted m simply disappear.

Doyle was not surprised at the counteroffer. It was one of possibilities they had planned for, even down to an much they might offer as payment (Martinez could have gotten $50,000, if he had insisted). Doyle agreed two suggested was the defection take place that very evening. When Martinez nodded his head at agreement, Doyle described a tax that Martinez would find parked on a surest near the embersy and suggested that Martinez might want to my find it

The entire conversation had taken less than five minutes. The two men walked off in different directions, and non-minutes later, after a few brief words with another American colleague, Harold Doyle was listening to a vacuous explanation of Venezuelus politics offered by a half-drupk Peruvian diplomat.

Martinez didn't will me his wife before all slipped out to find the taxt watting in tool him our exile. The taxt took Silvestre Martinez to a safe house in the suburbs where he spent the next three months with CIA debriefers. During that time, the Cuban Embassy frantically searched for the missing diplomat. On several necessions, its spokesmen made public demands that the Americans tell that what his happened to Martinez, but they had no proof that the U.S. Embassy had been involved in Martinez's sudden disappearance.

Junge heard dozens of different rumors discussed in the backseat of the embassy car he drove, including one wife suggesting to a friend that Silvestre's supervisor had arranged to have Silvestre kidnapped and attack because Silvestre had found and about the supervisor's love affair with his wife and threatened to go public with a complaint.

GIA interrogaturs prepared several hundred pages of Martinez. The station reports officer rhen reduced the data to several dozen intelligence reports and forwarded them to CIA headquarters.

With the debriefing completed, the sneaked Silvestre Martinez out of Venezuels on board one of the U.S. Air Force Boeing 707s in the executive fleet. The sireraft had flown a group of U.S. Congressmen to Carness for an inspection on the progress of U.S. same as a stitute programs.

Today Silvestre lives in Miami. He has a more name, a new wife, a new career, and he avoids anything having to do with politics. Everyone who knows him as his pass identity, including his new wife, thinks he was once a mility worker who fied Cuba on a raft.

A dozen different CIA analysis working under the direction of the deputy director for intelligence (DDI) reviewed the intelligence reports us the debriefing of Silvestre Martinez. The information was condensed into a four-page intelligence dissemination report, which was then edited and rewritten a half-dozen times.

The staffers in the GIA responsible for the final dissemination of the report an this operation were not happy with the results. First, they criticized the station and Doyle for not consuming Martinez to remain in place. They also criticized Doyle for allowing Martinez to defect without a public announcement, flut what most bothered the Washington wirelds was that the information provided by Martinez didn't support the U.S. foreign policymakers' own beliefs about Cuban diplomatic activities in Latin America.

Although Martinez had confirmed that the Cuban government was committed to spteading revolution in Latin America, he described the Cuban diplomatic effort as inept, incompetent, and disorganized. He portrayed the Cuban diplomatic corps as a collection of competing careerists who sum frightened of their own security investigators and incapable of taking advantage of new opportunities that occasionally developed in host countries.

Because most of the CIA intelligence reporting in that area described the Cuban revolution at a major threat at the development of democracy in Lavin America—a threat that required a massive infusion of both economic development assistance and manual political action—the agency's horeautrats decided that Silvestre Mastinez must have been a disinformation plant. They therefore limited the dissemination of the report to a few imp-level policymakers within the intelligence community, with a cavear as a cover sheet, warning that the information might not be reliable. In an doing, they demonstrated the basic principle that good intelligence has me value if the recipient a net willing to act on that which process the project's previous beliefs were around on that we have seen how government espionage agencies work, let's take a lonk as how a person with an amount of the government of political group can apy successfully. This example involves an amplest kind of spying: a utuation or which one individual wants to know what another individual is keeping secret.

Janet Thompson suspected that her husband, Bill, was having an affair with his secretary, Mandy Shumway, and that might be planning on this ing Janet and her two teenaged children Bill was the owner/manager of a real estate investment form worth several million dollars Janet would have happily given Bill a divorce, provided that she got half the value of his business (something guaranteed by the community-property laws of the mate where they fived). She feated, however, that Bill might be moving fonds out of the firm into secret bank accounts and that she would wake up day to find Bill long gone, leaving her nothing but a company stripped of each and facing bankruptcy. On the other hand, if Bill am engaged in nothing but a short-time fling, Janet was willing to let the flame burn out—provided the company profits kept rolling in.

Because was well known in the cummunity, Janet didn't want to discuss the issue with a local lawyer or private detective, for fear that Bill might learn about her suspicions and take preemptive action, Janet instead discussed her problem with her brother, Ted Monet, a career military offices who was assigned as an assistant air force attaché in the U.S. Embassy in Singapore and who are visiting the United States on home feave.

Ted, with three more weeks of leave on his hands and already bored with sturing at the lake in front of his armone cabin, decided to make it a busman's holiday by practicing a few of the skills he had learned as a military intelligence officer. He called two old military huddies and invited them and their wives down to share the lakeside hoose where he was staying, explaining the entertainment he was setting up for the occasion as an entra enticement. Both the couples arrived two days later, anxious to get up with the apy game Ted had promised as a diversion.

Ted assigned one of the two couples, Sylvia and Terry Minera, to a full-time surveillance of Mandy. The other couple, Dawn and Craig Wallop, began a surveillance of the investment firm with the intention of identifying possible sources working for the husband who might report on what was happening inside the company

Sylvia and Terry quickly confirmed that Bill and Mandy man engaged in a bot and heavy rimance, often taking long lunch hours together as well as spending loss of time as the office "working last" after the niher employees went home. They continued the surveillance while looking for a possibility of a observe meeting with Mandy and Bill when they were together.

Craig and Dawn, using information provided by fanet, identified three people who worked at the firm who might know something about how Bill was managing the and Bow. One of the employees, Mark Weiss, attended the Methodist church with his family every Sunday morning. The Wallups also learned that the Weiss couple was avid duplicate bridge players.

The Wallops went to the same chutch the next Sunday, telling everyone they met that they planning to move into the They met the Weiss family and quickly "discovered" mutual interest in duplicate bridge. Mrs. Weiss not only suggested that the Wallops come to their next bridge game, but also invited the new friends home for a Sunday brunch

By the time the four people got in the dessert, Craig had let it slip will be was looking for some investment property that the planned much to the city depended on what properties might be available. Mark readily volunteered the fact that he was associated with a real estate investment firm and then let it slip that he wasn't much happy in his jub. Answering a few friendly questions, he explained surne of the reasons why, including vague references to some strange investment moves by the company president.

Craig, dropping hints that he might have a lucrative employment opportunity for Mark of things worked out, and Mark or talk in more detail and learned that what bothered Mark most about his job was that fill had recently made a number of business decisions an mortgages and property sales that didn't make a lot of sense in the current market.

Ted spent his time at the local county courthouse, collecting all the available information on the properties that were owned or managed by Bill's company. Ted discovered that new loans had recently been taken out on several pieces of property for the maximum amount possible, while the bank loans on three other pieces of property had shortly thereafter been paid off.

Next. Ted spent a few hours with a desktop computer, a scanner, a color printer, and several packages of plastic identification card cover material. Armed with a complete set of fake documents, he called as the escrow company that usualli handled the escrow accounts of Bill's company. Announcing himself as a special agent for the IRS and flashing documents are prove it. Ted som ushered into the manager's office. The manager quickly agreed to cooperate with the investigation led claimed he was conducting on Bill's company.

With the manager's cooperation, Ted feathed that an estrow account had been opened an one of the pieces of property on which the outstanding loan had recently been paid as full. The closing date was set for September 15, just two weeks away. Ted pulled his same set with the two other estrow companies in the man He found an estrow account had been opened on another piece of property in one of the companies with the same closure date. The manager at the third estrow company refused to telease any information, maisting that fed first get either a search warrant as a court subpoena.

Promising he would immediately to so, led suggested he would rather not go to the trouble if there was nothing to subpoens. The manager then confirmed to it if the IRS agent presented a subpoens, no would go records of interest. Terf thanked the manager and left, now certain that Bill was paraget in this case pieces of manager property on the same day for a combined total of something in the neighborhood of four million dollars.

Sylvia and Terry followed Bill and Mandy one evening to a small French restaurant located in a nearby city. Sylvia and Terry also are in the restaurant, aiting at a table men Bill and Mandy, but paying attention only to each other. The Minetas left the restaurant a few minutes before bill and Mandy and then spent some time necking in their car, breaking up the sension with just enough time to deliberately crash their car into Bill's as he and Mandy drove saw of the parking lot.

Profusely apologizing and accepting full responsibility for the accident. Terry offered to pay all the repair costs, provided HD didn't call the police as involve the insurance companies. Playing the frightened man afraid he's about to be found out. Terry confessed that he and Sylvia were not married as each other. While Terry arranged to pay for the repairs to Bill's ear (giving a fake address as which Bill was supposed to send the repair bill). Sylvia started talking as Manify, tricking her dating a married man, with all the troubles that go with the territory. Sylvia suggested to Mandy that the two of them ought to get together once as a while to keep each other company. Like most women dating married men, Mandy spent a tal of lonely evenings while Bill was home with his family. She jumped at the chance for a new friend who understood and sympathized with her situation.

Sylvia invited Mandy to dinner the next evening that Bill served home with his family. Sylvia monopolized the early part of the conversation by telling a tall tale about her hope-the situation; she knew her lover was never going to divorce his wife. When Sylvia suggested that Mandy's situation was probably just as hopeless, Mandy bragged that she was much luckier, adding that Bill and her lover were about to elope. Although not giving all the details, Mandy explained that Bill and she would soon leave for New Zealand, where they were going to start life over as a morried couple under a new identity. Mandy added a long rationalization for why full was justified in abandoning a butchy wife and two spoiled teenagers and had no texpect for their father

Putting everything together. Ted knew that Bill was a small going to elope with Mandy. He planned to take the payments with the three pieces of mortgage-free property and camafer the funds to foreign bank accounts will then jump the first plane to New Zealand, where he expected to live out the test of his life with Mandy, funct would not only be left with nothing but a bankrupt company, she would also probably he stuck with the responsibility of paying off the capital gains on the properties Bill sold.

When Ted presented Janet the evidence he and his friends had discovered, she hired a lawyer who took immediate maken. Two days before Bitl expected to finalize it all and final for New Zealand, a process server handed him a collection of subpoents that would not only take him into court for divorce proceedings but prohibited any monetary withdrawals.

from the esemw accounts until after the property settlement.

The first time they met in a constroom, Janet twisted the knife a hir by telling Bill that it was $15 girlfriend who bill blown the escape plan by talking too much at a man friend.

In the final serdement, Janet got most of the muses from the escrow accounts. Fill got stuck with the heavily mortgaged properties in a falling real estate market, and Mandy moved as another state without giving Bill her new address.

SPYING WORTH THE TIME, MONEY, REFORT, AND RISKS

That's the question everyone considering spring on someone cise must ask. For Janet, the answer was obviously yes. By spying on her husband, his business, and her girl-friend, Junet was able to take timely serion that taved her and her two children from severe economic and emotional distress. Forthermore, she obtained that information at a minimum cost because of the brother's expertise with his willingness to not only work for free himself, but to recruit four others to work with him. Her brother did take what some would describe as an unacceptable risk when the pretended to be an IRS special agent, but even that tisk was automal in that field made only three calls on three different people on the same day while using the take ID. He made made any further contact with the people to whom he showed the computer-generated take gredentials.

Spying Alone Won't Guarantee Victory

Many historians and entics of the U.S. intelligence effort through the Gold War agree that the KGB wan the 5pt war in the field of covert information collected by using recruited spics. Over the years, the KGB and its allies achieved repeated spices in recruiting spies like Whittaker Chambers, the Rosenbergs, Kim Philby, John Walker, Richard W. Miller, Aldrich Aines, and, of course, U.S. Manine security guard Sgr.

Ulayton J. Lonetree. (These and others were all found our. We must arrow there were many more spies for the Soviet government who were never discovered.)

On the other hand, the CIA was notably unsuccessful in their attempts to recruit spies inside either the Soviet Union or any of the Soviet bloc countries. (Those good spies we did get were mostly walk-ins, and most of those were eventually exposed by the spies the KGB required from our side.)

The reasons the CIA failed so miserably in recruiting good sources inside the Soviet Union and Soviet blue countries are anim. One obvious impediment was the difficulty of gaining access to potential spies in a rightly controlled totalitation everent that puts severe limitations on personal freedoms. The Soviet government witched its citizens, especially those with access to government secrets, in ways that can never be employed in a free society. For the Soviet eltizen, the risks of spying were simply too great and the chances of enjoying any rewards too small. Soviets who might have furned to spying were more interested in getting out of the system than in staying made. It system while making money on the side by selling secrets.

Yet, despite the fact that the KGB won the spy was, the Soviet L mon is history, and the world now has only one superpower. We United States of America. Good intelligence never guarantees victory, and bud intelligence doesn't necessarily ensure defeat. Knowing the enemy's secret plans won't do much good if his army is bigger, better equipped, better rained, better motivated, more combat ready, and holding the high ground.

Throughout the Cold War the KGB man playing catch-up. It His steat our atomic secrets, but by the time the Soviet Union had built its first amount bomb we were already stock-piling hydrogen bombs. The Soviets got ahead of us just once, the lamehing of the first satellite, but even after Sputnik we quickly caught up, and we didn't have to steal any of their to do it.

Soviet where things we didn't have at know or things we already knew Indeed, mixed of the CIA to much of the money spent in an empting to recruit spies inside the Soviet government not only failed to get good intelligence information, but even if they had succeeded, what the CIA would have learned would not have been at the money spent on collecting the intelligence.

Even when we did get good intelligence, is an often ignored because it suggested that the Soviet Union was not the dangerous monster our politicians tried to make it our to be, but rather a disastrous economic and social experiment that was doubted to faithre, regardless of what we did to oppose it.

The Expected Results of Spying Must Justify the Costs

Anyone who decides to take up spying needs to ask the questions the U.S. intelligence community never asked itself before asking Congress for loss of money; what exactly make one expect to learn, and will the information his valuable enough to justify the cost and the potential risk?

In the case of Janet Thompson, the information on what her husband was planning was food worth the small cost that mean the risk her brother took. But lea's look at another manple of patrate spying.

Jeffery Zweihel was the chief executive officer in Modern Fashions, which produced and sold economy-prized women's clothing that pretended to be high fashion. For several years Modern Fashions had run a close second to sales to Parisian Day. Zweibel was concerned that Parisian Day was starting to pull ahead in both said and profits, even though said companies sold similar products in about the same pince.

To say about what he did for the government. He was much more interested in listening to Jeffery talk about his business.

After Jeffery complained about how he was losing out to the compension. Terry suggested that Jeffery ought to do assume spying on the opposition and learn what secrets might be responsible for Pansian Day's success. When Jeffery complained that he didn't have any idea how to launch such an effort. Terry offered to help Jeffery out, but warned his friend that a good intelligence collection effort would be expensive. When Jeffery asked how expensive. Terry began scribbling an a notepad as he worked out how much he would have to charge an recruit several spies inside Pansian Day. The proposed sixfigure price staggered Jeffery, and Mit rejected she plan.

Four weeks later, one of Modern Fashions' biggest buyers announced that she was dropping the Modern Fashions line and would be buying exclusively from Parisian Day. Convinced that Parisian Day had done something dirty in excluding Modern Fashions from a major market. Jeffery colled Terry and, out of desperation, agreed as the proposed terms for running a spying operation against Parisian Day.

Over the same several weeks. Terry, working with several service agents, successfully recruited five Parisian Day employees as spiral.

The first recruit was Tonya Lopez, a cleaning indy. A middre-aged, single mother. Tonya had a 19-year-old son. Eduardo, who had recently been arrested and charged with aggravated astault following a street gang fight. While waiting as the courtroom for a heating on the charges, Tonya met imelda Melendez, a young woman who claimed to be working for one of the many advicacy groups that serve the city's poor Imelda arranged for a lawyer, who got the charges against Eduardo reduced to a misdemeanor with no time in jail. (Tonya mana noticed that Imelda helped only one person on a courtroom (all of defendants.)

Several days later, Imelda told Tonya that the advocacy group she represented was investigating the abuses of work-

From the garment industry. Using implied threats that Tonya's and could find himself back at court facing man foliusy charges, combined with the offer of regular cash payments, imelds convinced Tonya that she should begin spying on her employer.

Tonya was soon passing on to Imelda the contents of the trush cans in the Parisian Day executive office. She also planted soveral different listening devices is such places as the CEO's office, her conference room, and an ladies' hathroom. Just as important, Tenya unld Imelda a great 2000 an information about the people who worked at Parisian Day: their names, their positions, what kinds of private things they kept in their desks, the telephone numbers in their Rotodexes descriptions of their cars and their license plate numbers.

David Misisco worked as a midlevel executive in the Parisjan Day sales office. David was among that a female colleague had gotten a promotion that he had wanted and was convinced that she had gotten the promotion only because of elfametive acron. David complained bitterly about his struction is his new friend. Joe Killory, whom to met while taking a right course in salesmanifup at a city college. A sympathetic Killory fer it slip that he sometimes sold information and suggested that there were people who would pay good money for inside information on Pansian Dav's sales campaigns. Although Killors wouldn't say who his customer might be. David assumed it was Modern Fashions. He happily agreed to become a per inside Parisian Day, David not only enjoyed the money that Killon (really Daniels) started paying him. M also get a more kick our of playing spy with all the dead drops, secret meetings, and sorveillance-evasion training that Daniels provided.

Regina Merica, who worked in this Parisian Day executive secretary pool, with Donald Snell at a church social and soon the hopelessly in love. Snell, who told Regina he worked on Wall Street as an investor, promised to many her as soon as he cashed in an several investments he had made based on insidentification. Then one day Donald appeared at Regina's apartment, wearing a terrified expression and telling her that a stranger had approached him in the street and handed him in envelope containing evidence of his insider-trading activity. The blackmaiter didn't want a monetary payoff to keep him from passing the information to the Security and Exchange Commission; he wanted Donald to convince Regina that she is a begin spying on her hosses as Paristan Day.

At first Regins refused, but after several many lovers' spars, a threat of succide, and a promise that she would only have to go along until Donald could cash in the trades and collect the profits, she met with a stranger (Terry Daniels, of course), who taught her how to pass him information through a dead drop.

Terry also sucreeded in rectniting a delivery driver and one of the Panisian Day bookkeepers. Alan Stremple.

This was a casebook study in how to recruit and run a ring of spies. Each of the spies had been recruited under a different false flag, and none of them knew about the others.

See months after putting Terry on the payroll, Jeffery knew $\mathbb{R}$ the secrets there asses to know about Parisian Day. He had learned that Parisian Day was contracting out mean of its sewing work to aweatshops that employed undocumented aliens, that its bookkeepers were conking the books to avoid income cases. Self that it was stealing pattern designs from the same expensive fishion houses. These, however, were also things that Jeffery was doing at Modern Fashions.

Jeffery tise had a foot-high life with the details of l'arislan. Day's production and sales procedures. He had the list of customers the total sales figures, production costs, personal details as buyers, and just about everything else that someone at Paristan Day had anison down over the last five years. He had drawings of Parisian Day's planned fashion designs, its distribution figures, and advance information on its advertising europaigns.

Jeffery also knew a lot about the people who worked at Parisian Day, including the CEO. Donna Sposato. He knew that Donna's current lower was Sharon Katzke, something that David didn't know. Jeffery also know the cuttent halance in Ms. Sposato's personal bank account, what medication she was taking, and where Donna and Sharon did their social drinking as well as the bed and breakfast where they often spent weekends. He had the same kind of personal information is every single executive working for Parisian Day.

Yet, despite the stacks of documents and reports from the spies he had working inside Parisian Day, Jeffery didn't have a single hit of actionable intelligence, that is, information he could use to gain an advantage over the competition

The sample fact, which Jeffery refused to consider, more than white Modern Fashions and Parisian Day produced almost identical lines of clothing. Donna was a better person or and CEO than he was Most people liked working for her, and they worked just a bit harder at Pansian Day than at Modern Fashions. This influenced the way that Pansian Day employees dealt with customers, who, as a result, them Purisian Day sales and service personnel more than they liked those working for Modern Fashions. Therefore, if all other factors such as price, quality, and fashion design were equal, which they usually were, buyers would give as much bitsmess as they could to Pansian Day.

If Jeffery had bothered to ask just about anyone in the fashion industry why he was foring business to Paristan Day, they might have told him the troth. But he wasn't the kind of their who would ever admit to himself will anyone knew the fashion business better than he did

Desperate me men the intelligence he had paid as much to obtain. Jeffery finally decided the best way to hurt Pansian Day would be to pass me the information he had an Pansian Day's bix avoidance to the IRS. He the see and Pansian Day's bix avoidance to the IRS he the see and Pansian Day's bix avoidance to the IRS examiners that would eventually cost the company more than a hondred thousand dollars.

Even here, Parisian Day was served by an employees. The bead of accounting quickly identified midlevel bookkeeper

Alan Stremple as the source of the information that had been pussed to the IRS. Donna immediately fired Stremple, and her senior accountants were able to neutralize most of the damage he had done. Although Pazisian Day did have to pay back taxes, the total amount was a great deal less than what the IRS officers had been led to expect they would collect.

An angry IRS supervisor then decided to look closely at other businesses in the garment industry, starting with the name he already knew. Jeffery did not have tookkeepers who were as clever or as loval to the company as Parisian Day's. Jeffery's bills for back taxes, combined with his business losses, forced him into bankruptey.

Avoiding Intelligence Mistakes

Jeffery's first mistake was forgetting the primary fule of histories, keep your eye no the customer. What he should have usked was, "What is Parisian Day giving the customers that my company is nor?" The people who had the answer to the question were the customers themselves. He needed amon good, legitimate market research, not an espionage system managed by a washed-out CIA case officer.

Jeffery's real problem was self-deception. He refused to admit to himself that his declining sales and the loss of old sustomers were signals that he wasn't meeting the demand of the customers.

The moral of this story a simple before deciding to spy an accuracy else, you must first have a very good idea about what information you expect to find, and you should have a clear plan on how must intend to use that information to gum an advantage. Too many people, including many at government, spy an others because they can't figure out what else to do. They begin by deceiving themselves, refusing to recognize their own failures to serve the legitimate needs of their customers an estimans. Instead, they hope to discover an explanation for their personal and institutional failures in the camp of an enemy.

Surveillance

A successful apy-recruitment operation begins with souccessful surveillance. You should start a surveillance operation as your decide to start apying on surreillance clse. The question you need to answer before beginning surveillance is not how much surveillance should be done, but, rather, how much budget and insupower can be committed to surveillance, and how to use them must effectively to gather the most important information.

Because there are numerous good books describing the skills and techniques of surveillance, including several outstanding works to the Paindin catalog, I won't describe the details of surveillance techniques. Instead, I will focus on what a good intelligence sum officer hopes in discover through surveillance. Nevertheless, the reader must understand that surveillance skills, including skills in the use of surveillance photography and high-tech listening devices, are extremely important for every intelligence case officer. Every professional intelligence-collection agency in the world puts at case officer trainces through long hours of rigorous instruction and practice to surveillance, surveillance avoidance, and sporting others who are watching or following the traince.

The case officer watches the target organization's office and everyone who works and visits there in identify employces and associates of the target. The surveillance and identitive everyone who might are an important part of the organization, especially those who might know the secrets of the organization or have access to those who will know the secrets the case officer wants to stead.

Employees are easy to identify because they show up as work and leave at the end of the day at roughly the same times. Also, they can often be identified as so the type of work they do by what they wear to work. Professionals dress as suited delivery men, cleaning women, and maintenance people dress more casually and may wear uniforms. Once the case officer identifies such people, then the surveillance expands to watching them. The surveillance must discover who they are, where they work, where they live, what they do to their space time, and, most important, what they is that they want to keep some. Curs, homes, and recreational parameters will also provide considerable data on levels of income and how important each employee is to the target organization.

The most important goal of the preliminary surveillance is to identify possible amount for spying—those who have access to intelligence 359 who might be conned most spying. Once potential recruits are identified, the sorterilance should look closely at each potential recruit, trying or least everything possible about their lives, especially uncovering personal problems or moral weaknesses. This will include evidence that a potential recruit fives above his manage has difficulty getting along with other people, has family problems, and any other information that might be used as a recruitment attempt.

LOOK AT WHAT THE SURVEILLANCE TARGET THROWS AWAY

It's amazing what sume people throw away—canceled checks, old credit card receipts and their carbon copies, empty medicine bottles, personal letters, memos and reminder many old bills, grocery receipts, shapping lists, formery and betting trekers, and many is set things they never intended to throw away but accidentally dropped into a mash can. You can learn the addresses of friends and business contacts from envelopes, the type of medicine they are taking, all about their personal finances, what kind of legal problems they face, what unions or professional associations they belong to, where their children go as school, what magazines the family reads, how much they drink and so on.

Even though the public has been warned repeatedly about the dangers of throwing away such things as credit card charge copies and bank balance sheets, most people keep toosing such things in the trush and then putting out the trish where anyone am pick it up before the gurbage collector comes along.

Government intelligence and police agencies understand are intelligence value of garbage; therefore, most government agencies with any security concerns burn all their paper trush. Most private catizens, public organizations, and humners offices are notoriously lax about controlling trush that leaves the nifice and even more careless when it comes in disposing of written material while at home or on the road.

The mean serious problems in collecting garbage are avoiding hearing observed while picking up the can man doing it in a way that the subject never realizes that $8 garbage is being examined $2 on adversary $1 part of the ongoing surveillance should establish the household or office trash routine so that the garbage can be retrieved without being observed between the time it is placed in a Dumpster of set out for pickup and the time it is placed by the garbage truck.

IDENTIFY YOUR TARGET'S ENEMIES

Anyone who is engaged in a dispute of any kind with a target of an intelligence penetration E a potential source of information. Thorough surveillance can identify angry ex-lovers, fired employees, political upponents, business competitors, people owed money by the target, rivals for promotion, and anyone else who might wish harm to the rarget, his friends, and his employees. Such people will often know a lor about the one they hate and will willingly share the dirt with almost anyone who will listen to them.

LISTEN TO WHAT YOUR TARGET IS SAYING

What is your targer saving in public and in private manager sations to which you are privy? If it's a business, read the annual reports and advertising copy. If it's a political organization, read the press releases and listen to what is put on the public record. Go to public meetings or tend tomeune to such meetings. Look at credit reports, public tax records, documents required by campaign laws, court records, and every official, semiofficial, and public document you and lay your hands on

WHAT WILL YOUR TARGET TELL YOU IN YOU ASK?

The whole idea behind diplomacy is that both sides assume that it is a better idea as exchange information than it is an fight. Obviously, when two hostile parties that, both sizes will be telling lies about their intentions, their strengths. The their fears. Even so, the master of deteption must also learn to be a master as recognizing deception in others. Sometimes, people telling lies let stip more buth than they realize. (Remember, a good its must have a lot of truth mixed with it.) If you recognize the lie, then you can guess what truth the lie is trying to cover.

Oftentimes, face-to-face, nonthreatening confrontations will reveal more about your target than see can learn through e sophisticated spy program. This is especially true if you are the rechniques of friendly intertogation as described in Chapter 2 when meeting with your enemy in person. Use such a meeting to leate as much about your enemy as you can while revealing only those things about yourself that will strengthen your position with the enemy.

IF POSSIBLE, GET AN INVITATION TO THE TARGET'S HOME

This is often easier than you would suppose, provided the intelligence officer or one of all agents is not known to the target. You might pretend to be a reputation, salesman, private investigator collecting information on a neighbor, volunteer for a chanty soliciting donations, or even a policeman or fireman offering a little safety inspection.

Once inside a home, always have a sudden nature call, It's surprising how much you can learn about someone by guining scress to the barbroom and the medicine cabinet.

This is best demonstrated by a recent seam in which a tent preacher, who elained he could heal the sick, would apy in helievers who had written letters requesting free from seat to kets to one of his healing revivals. A few days before the testival, a well-dressed young woman driving a new model can would fake a mechanical breakdown in front of the target's home. The young woman would attempt to fix the said by working under the base has a bit, making sure she got some but and gome on her hands. Then, acting frustrated and angry, she would ring the bell of the target's house and ask to use the phone, explaining that she was supposed to be at an important meeting and that she needed to call the people expecting her and then call as auto clob. Once the calls were usade, she asked if she could use the bathroom to wash the grease and gome off her hands.

What she learned would be put in good use at the next revival meeting. On the night of the man revival, the preacher walked through the audience, proclaiming that God—through him, of course—was looking for someone to bless with a healing: "I see a woman named Evelyn who is chained to Valium. Dr. Bernheart writes her the prescription because he can't heal her like God can. The expensive virginist that Evelyn buys from the Nature's Way Vitamin Company won't do in eather. The double-strength aspinn she buys in the 200-tablet horses helps the pain for only a white, but God mann to help her for eternity."

Evelyn, convinced that the preaches had a direct line to the Almighty, didn't think about the pretty many bits who asked to use the phone several days earlier as the preaches suddenly turned, looked at her, and asked, "Your name is Evelyn, isn't sta"

Once you know everything that can be learned through surveillance while the target and those who work for him as have some personal relationship with him, sam are ready to make recritting people at toy on the target.

SPOTTENG

The major products of good surveillance will a list of potential recruits for spying.

There are two primary criteria that must be considered in identifying a potential tectust. The first criteria is that of access: does the potential recruit have access to the information the intelligence collector wants to steal? Potential recruits should be rated in order of the probability that they will have access to secret intelligence or have a personal relation with someone who has access

The second enteria is personality assessment: is the potential recruit someone who can be subverted?

Anyone looking for a good app should focus on the following classes of employees in the target organization:

- Angry or desperate uppers and midlevel management personnel. These are the people who have lost the trust of their colleagues or have personal secrets that would lose them such trust if their secrets were discovered. Stuck on the career ladder because of their own incompetence, they fear that they are going to lose their jobs and are looking for both sympathy and someone as blame for their failure to succeed. The best prospects are those who have been recently passed over for promotion. They will be angry and may 10 looking for possible revenge, a way out of the dilemma, in some way as remake their world into something more to their liking.
- Clerks, orrotanes, and communications personnel. These people see lots of secret information. Although most areas employees are surprisingly loval as their bosses—despite their low position on the pay scale—main have personal problems and mass that make them potential subjects the recruiting. They may have tastes they can't afford as feed, and they are massive of those who am afford such fuxuries, especially among their higher-paid colleagues.
- Janitors, drivers, cleaning ladies, and other "invisible" people.
  Underpoid and often ignored of even monetalist these workme always need more money for the simplest things. Many of them have more secess to secret information, or can ger access, than the more and shakers in the organization ever imagine.

The best potential spies for combining both criteria are the unglampious and sometimes ugly people who in their uiten duli and always routine jobs have access to secrets.

Other especially good prospects are antisocial personalitics incapable of loyalty to anything. These types of people are also the most likely to have secret vices. They may gamble when they don't have take to cover the losses, drink ron much, use illegal drugs, cogage in high-risk sexual behavior, and have domestic problems. Most important, they are lookies for easy ways out of their troubles.

Unfurnisately, life is no some fair for the intelligence case afficer than it is for anyone else, and the best is not what you usually get. Instead of identifying the perfect retruit, most more officers find themselves with a list of potential recruits, none of whom come close to marching what the case officer hopes to find. The person with the best access to the information will be a recently promoted, contented worker, who is happily marned with great kids. In termis vices, and a high-li-developed sense of loyalty.

Often, the initial surveillance will discover no min who might have access in valuable information and who for the personality profile of a potential spy. Comptomises mint then to made, and the experienced case officer will usually choose the person with the personality traits that make him an imministrate for recruitment over the person who has better access to intermation. It is better in have a loss-than-adequate spy than no spy at all.

in such a second the case officer will have to settle for an initial recruitment of an area agent, someone who has direct access an others who may eventually prove as have potential as a primary agent. At the very least, a good access agent can provide the area to access agent on plant electronic bugs, take pictures of physical plants, as report on officer gossip.

EVALUATION.

Once the case officer has identified potential restricts, each one must be thoroughly evaluated in order to identify the possible mutives for why the target would be induced to turn traitor and to determine what type of approach will must likely succeed. The case officer must then decide who will make the initial approach, what curver story the recruiting case officer will uses what entirements will be offered to coment their friendship and treate annespation for more rewards, and how the recruit will be managed through the recruitment process.

The case officer must also decide the will attempt to use the regret is an unintemporal spy, at if the region will be manipulated into a position where he voluntarily agrees to spy, perhaps as a favor as his new friend or because the friend offices to solve the target's personal problems.

RECRUITING

The basic formula a case officer uses for recruiting a spy is a simple one.

- The case officer, or someone controlled by the man officer, pretends to be someone the target would respect desire, admire, as perhaps even feat.
- The recruiter arranges to meet and get to know the target.
- Once acquainted, the rectiniter develops a close personal relationship with the target based on man on more of the target of friendship, such as sexual attraction, common interests, uniilar personalities, managem political objectives, or minual hates, and offers to help solve personal problems.
- The recruiter builds the relationship into one in which the target trusts the recruiter and looks to the for advice and help in solving personal problems. At the same men the recruiter will subtly encourage and support the behavior that creates those personal problems.

- The recruiter asks the rarget and innucent favors and serand rewards the target with praise, money, sex, drugs, psychological support, or a combination of those things.
- Taking advantage of the growing trust and dependence of the target, the recruiter asks the target to provide unimportant hits of information about the organization targeted for intelligence collection. The recruiter treats such harmless bits of knowledge on more important than they really and and rewards the ranget for his acryice.
- As the target responds in a positive manner, the recruiter makes additional requests that step progressively closer in treason. The recruiter increases the rewards given to the point that the rarget comes to expect and, perhaps, becomes dependent on them. At the same time, the recruiter helps the target in find psychological justification for betraving those who trust him.
- The recruiter takes the final arm, asking the target to provide important information that will be a clear betrayal of his earlier lovalties to his government, employer, trusted confederates, in lover

Choosing the Recruiter

The man officer may either handle the initial contact himself in use a surrogate he controls. A surrogate recruiter can be an access agent, some third party who doesn't realize he is being used, or another case officer picked because he has the specific personality man needed, it is also possible that a case officer from a different territory will be brought in to handle the recruitment in case the operation turns sour. In such event, the recruiting officer can go home after the failure, and the primary case officer can look for another recruit, without having to fear exposure by the rarget of the failed attempt.

If another professional case officer is used, he should be fully informed about the reasons for recturment and what the operations officer expects to get from the rectur. On the other hand, access agent may know little or nothing about why the target is being recruited or, for that matter, who will really benefit from the spying.

Preferably, such an access agent will not know who led is really working for. For example, a case officer may hire a prostume who approaches a potential recruit known to be ripe for a love experience. The case officer tells the prostume that the target is a business customer be wants to get relaxed and teady to deal with when, in fact, the case officer is a KGR agent who wants to set up the target for a blackmail recruit ment. The prostume, at the instruction of the case officer, then pretend to be a college student looking for work or a recently divorced woman looking for love when the meets the target for the first time.

Once the access agent gers in know the target and earns has love of trust, he will lead the target into an introduction with the new officer, who will then take over direct control of the target. For example, the prostructe might first develop a turnance relationship with the target and then introduce the target to the case officer at a social function as an old friend or relative. In other attractions, the access agent or the matter officer may introduce the primary case officer in the target during a chance meeting in a matter on a start course, at church, or as a har.

It must be impossible to make direct contact with the best potential rectuit. Pethaps he never goes out in public, or the hides behind a scenetary who screens all his appointments had a extremely suspictous of any approach by a stranger who was not been properly introduced. In such a same, the same officer may enlist the help of an unnocent third party who is close as the sarget, perhaps a relative, an old friend, a business associate, or even his wife or child. The man officer first makes friends with the associate or family member, and then when he gains that person's trust, he manipulates the unwriting accomplice into introducing the target to him.

Whether he makes the initial contact or uses a surrogate, the case officer arranges a meeting with the potential recruit that appears to be a normal occurrence on the daily life of the recruit. It most using it should take place in a nonthreatening social sistematic preferably when the potential retruit in relating away from the office. The target might be approached while on vacation, at church, or perhaps traveling in a foreign country.

Government agencies often approach a target while he is traveling abroad. Indeed, if he lives in a repressive country in which the government regularly spies on its citizens, recruitation in a foreign enuntry may be the only possibility. The Mossad almost never stations case agents inside Arab countries Instead, they focus their recruitment efforts on Arabs who travel abroad.

The idea is to set up a social situation in which the target remembers the meeting as one in which de took the initiative. It is best if a situation is designed in that the target approaches the recourse and introduces himself.

In the counterespionage operation targeted against an intelligence officer working in the Soviet Embassy, an FBI recruiting team began attending meetings of a technical society where the suspected Soviet case officer often hung out. One of the members of the FBI team always arrived alone and imagined about from the other passeipants during the meetings, but occasionally asked probing questions that suggested his traces officer, obviously curious, started asking other quests at the meeting about the stranger, but no one seemed in know anything about him. Eventually, the Soviet agent asked one member of the FBI recrustment team, who told the Soviet a cover story that identified the attanger as a scientist working for a government contractor in the missile industry—an obvious target for Soviet recruitment.

Soon, the Soviet agent approached the planted FBI agent, who artfully managed to turn the tables and recroit the Soviet to tapy for the FBI. What started out as an attempt at recruitment an American to tapy for the Soviets ended up in the successful recruitment of a Soviet intelligence office, who provided extremely valuable information for several years. (This particular spy became one of the first victims after Rick Ames started spying for the KGB. Ames exposed the man on the KGB, and he was then suddenly transferred back to the Soviet Union, arrested, and eventually executed.)

In some circumstances the intelligence mans might want to create a situation in which the target, or a lover or family member of the target, in placed in danger, then the recruiter appears on the scene and rescues the target. Two support agents might attack a potential recruit on a dark mans. As she is about to be raped, a passing motorist stops and scares the tapiats away. The rescues, pretending to be a good Samantan, then rathers the woman to a police station in wherever the wants in go.

Instead of being the primary target, the woman might be all daughter of the primary target. The heroic case officer then accepts an invitation to taken with the father who wants as extend his thanks.

Another play is to arrange a minor traffic scordent that allows the opportunity to exchange names and addresses. The recentter doesn't have to be in the other can be could be the witness who are a description and license number of a hit-and-run driver.

The plot for such threatening situations might be rewritam so that it it the rectimes who appears to be in danger and the potential recruit saves itsi day. This works especially wellif the mitial contact agent is a pretty woman and the potential recruit scares off the criminals who are dragging her into an alley of are running away with her purse.

In a previous chapter we saw how a man agent first set up a love match, put the love in danger, and then introduced himself to the target, affering a solution that saved the girl and protected the target from exposure.

Wherever the initial approach is made, it should be a situation in which the man officer has control and am retreat quickly if something goes wrong. Although the recruinng operation should be easefully planned out in detail, the ease officer must be ready to flow with the events and situations and be prepared to take advantage of sudden opportunities.

Throughout the recomment process, intelligence officers should intensify the surveillance of the prospect. All meetings between the recruiter and subject should be munitored by a serveillance team. If possible, both sound and videotage recordings should be made. The intelligence team should gather any evidence that might be used to incriminate the subject—fingerprints, photos, tape recordings, and eyewitnesses—in the event the recruitment effort fails.

Once the target meets the case officer, the latter, who will almost always pretend to be comercing he is not, begans to build a nonthrestening friendship with the rarget. At the same time, everything the case officer says or does must be designed to put the target at case and make him or het enjoy the new friendship; the case officer should fin nothing that puts the target off guard arms the possible dangers of such a foundship.

The case officer must do whatever is necessary to become a trusted friend on whom the prospective rectain believes he can rely. To do this, the same officer will do the following:

- Listen to the target talk
- · Sympathize with the target's problems
- Offer easy solutions to the target's problems and lend a helping hand as solving such problems
- Feed the target's prejudices fifth play to his vanity, fears,
   The hopes
- Grant the target absolution too matter what terrible things he admits to having done?
- Best the target for simple favors and he grateful when they are granted but gracious when the target cannot help
- · Never orritize what the target holds dear

As the friendship develops, the case officer or his controlled surrogate leads the target into spying by making it appear as he a natural outcome of the (nendship. Often, the elever case officer will create a situation in which information becomes a commodity the target and and as help solve a problem faced by the target of the case officer himself.

The first request for information will be for something that appears to be harmless and perhaps even legitimate. It was be something a simple as a request for a company telephone book, training manual, or list of salesmen or company employees. The next step toward treason will be a request as something a bit more sensitive, but this time it will be accompanied by an offer of some kind of reward.

Gradually, the new friend leads the target into increasingly diegal and immoral behavior, all the while making a propothat the trustomes acts are further comenting the fundship of love affair. The inducement to treason our be psychological monivation, sex, money, or a combination of all three

In some attentions, the case officer may alrange secretly to create problems that threaten the target's peace of mind, employment, marriage, or even his life or the life of someone he loves. For example, a case officer may use an access agent to plant evidence that will may the target as trouble with his house or the law. The case officer then sympothizes with the aggrieved employee or loval citizen while subtly suggesting that the target ower no real lovalty to such an unfair employer or proportions.

If blackmail is used as an inducement in treason, the case officer will usually not be the one making the blackmail threat. A crude entrapment followed by blackmail threats from the case officer can easily backfire, and if it does, the case officer will have to withdraw and the recomment effort abandoned. A clever case officer will arrange for someone else to make the blackmail approach, and then he will offer a way to get out of the blackmail situation or collect the funds make essary to pay the blackmail demands. The recruiter may even pretend to be another victim of the same blackmailer. This was the method used in the following example.

The Manilo Blackmail Recruitment

The target of this recruitment operation, Carl Larson, was in Manda on a business trip when he overheard two Americans talking in a hotel but about their home town of San Jusé, California. Carl interrupted and introduced himself in sumcome who called San Jusé home, too. The two assets Carl to join them for a drink and introduced themselves as Bob French and Int Lee.

Rob sold Carl that he and Roll and just mer and joked about what a long way the three that come to meet a couple of neighborn. The three men exchanged husiness cards, had a few more drinks, and then Bill, who had bragged about his frequent traverse are Philippines, suggested that he take the other two men a lout of the infamous Manila night life.

After numerous drinks and stops of a half-dozon different girly bars featuring full nudity, the three men took three Filipping women they had met along the way to a short-time hotel that full recommended. There, the three men split compant, and each took his date to a separate room.

The next morning. Carl woke up with a terrible hangover and a heavy load of guile, compounded by the fear that the woman, who didn't look all that pretty or young in the mornine light, might have given him something he didn't want to be home to his wife. Carl guid the lady and then took a taxifick to the hotel with a quick stop at a pharmacy where he bought enough anobiotics to ensure that ill wouldn't come down with see of the less deadly diseases of love. He saw neither feel not built during the remainder of his stay in Manula.

Three weeks later, when he may back home in San José. Und opened an envelope delivered by a messenger and Miscovered a videotaped recording of his activities with the folipino prostume. The accompanying note made the usual blackmail threats about sending copies in his wife, the press, and his employer unless Carl paid $50,000. There were also instructions for making the payment to a numbered bank note in Panama.

As Carl sat there, stunned and frightened, he received an angry phone call from Bob French, who accused Carl of setting him up for blackmail. French rold Carl that because he was a bachelor and the owner of his own consulting company, he was blackmail proof. He not only refused to pay the management, he threatened to pay after both Carl and fill Lee, who French was sore must have conspired to blackmail him. Carl, hy now almost hysterical, vehemently denied the analysis and told Bob he may also being blackmailed—and that he wasn't blackmail-proof. Bob, cooling down, suggested that the two of them get together in discuss what to do next.

When they mer, facilistanted off by apologizing for accusing Carl of setting an the blackmail operation. He reported that since the morning conversation, he had tried to call Bill, but the number and address listed on Bill's business eard were phony Obvinually, it had been Bill that set up both of them. Whereas Carl, who didn't have $50,000 m available cash was terrified. Bob, although angry apparently was not worned about himself. Bob pointed out that even ill Carl found the money and paid at that would just be the first installment Going in the police wouldn't be any good either, because Bill.

was operating out of a foreign country

Bob wanted to put the blackmailer out of business, permonently, and suggested that any Corl's best hope as well, provided that in the process they could be first of the Blackmail material. He cold Corl Bil had some Philippine mounes he thought could do it for him, but he didn't make to make a move unless he knew that he black Carl's support. When Carl asked what that would cost, Bob rold him nor to worry, that his friends owed him a favor and that he felt partially responsible for Carl's problems because he hado'r sported that for the blackmailer he was. Bob suggested that Carl keep his mouth shur and not pay any blackmail for the same being. The longer they discussed the action, the more Bob made it sound like its was going to solve the problem more in a favor to Carl than because of any concern about himself.

A week later, during which time Carl received two more letters demanding immediate paymens, Bob called and suggested that the two of them meet for lunch. As soon as they had ordered the drinks, Bob explained that the contacts in Manila had found RIMS place of operation as well as evidence that he regularly entired visiting Americans into blackmail situations. They also had learned that Lee kept his blackmail evidence in a sife on a small apartment where he lived in Manila. Bob's friends had it are up with a emoked Filipino police colonel to break into the spartment, open the safe, collect the evidence, and that "put All out of business, permanently."

There are just one hitch: the payoff to the police colonel for his help (to casule that no one who engaged in the breakas would be eaught and arrested) was going to cost more than either. Bob to Bit friends had expected. Bob's friends in Manila had proposed a deal. They wanted a complete report on Carl's business activities during his visit to Manila, whom the met, what deals were arranged, and what kinds of profits.

Garl's company expected to make in Manila.

When Carl asked, Bob admirred that the information would go to a European competitor who wanted to make the deal with the Filipino corporation that Carl had been wooing. Bub added that his own opinion was that the competitor would get the faist anxway and that the Filipino form had been stringing Carl's company along to tree as leverage to get a better that out the European company.

In fact, Carl's trip to Manila had been a business bust. The proposed parener for the Filipino-Amarican venture wanted too big a share of the stock, and onless the Filipino changed his mind and lowered his demands, there would be no deal, man without another competitor bidding for the maness. Because Carl didn't want in go back to Manila ever again, he could have cared less if his company lost the market in the Philippines. He quickly agreed to do what Bob asked. A day later he gave Bob 20 the information he had requested.

A week later, Bob met with Carl again and handed him a package containing the original negatives and videotape of Carl's Manila night. Bob also assured Carl that he didn't have to warry about Bill, who had "disappeared."

Bob had another surprise for Carl. His founds in Manila had found the information that Carl had provided to useful that they were paying a bonus. Bob then handed Carl an envelope containing $1.000. He asked that Carl sign a receipt for the money to his friends that he had passed it us to the intended party. Bob assured Carl that are further record would be made of the transaction and that he could consider the money tax-free money that Box is Carl's employer not the 1RS would over know about

As soon as he signed that receipt, Carl was traced. The next siam. Bob asked for a bit of commercial intelligence and Carl's company's plans for a pending deal in Singapore. Carl made $1,500, exactly what he needed to pay for the unexpected orthodontic work his daughter required. Ouring the tieat several manus. Carl passed increasingly sensitive smallingence about his company's overseas deals on to the man to know as Bob French.

Bob and Bill had worked together in setting up the recruitment that entrapped Carl into becoming a corporate spy. Bill's disappearance assume murder. We just dropped the take identity he'd used for one operation.

When the Case Officer Can Openly Blackmail the Reunit

Although the case officer in usually nor the man who aethally blackmails the recruit during the initial process, once the recruit is working as a spy, the case officer may use blackmail, if necessary to keep the spy in line. The ease officer should always entired the necessary evidence that he can use in blackmail a recruit who decides he doesn't must to spy any longer.

In the previous example, for as long as Bob consrolled Carl, he kept in a safe his own copies of the photos half tapes of Carl's night on the town along with the growing pile of receipts for the unumer he paid Carl for company secrets. But he never had so use that material to control Carl.

Creativity & Always the Order of the Day

There are an infinite number of ways in which a case officer can decrive a rarger into running traitor. The best method is any specifically designed to fit the emotional, psychological, and memory sound of the rarger while subtly offering the carger a justification for what he is going to do—steal information and give it to the new friend, who has suddenly become an important part of his life.

Sometimes, honesty—or better said, must honesty—is the hest policy in a retruitment effor. If surveillance and investigation remains that a potential receipt in stready angry at his born, 60 might jump at the chance to do a little spying for the competition, especially if 60 can make more doing it. Intelligence experts who engage is commercial espionage are always on the lookout for disgnintled employees who are looking to new employment.

In such a case, the direct approach, in which the case offices offers that immediate rewards and the possibility of future employment, may be the second, quickest route to recruirment. That's why the cold pitch described in Chapter? That's why the chapter worked. Matriner was in a meet bind and the knew p. and the also knew that the only intelligence agency that would be interested in the information he had to self was the CIA. When you have a potential recruit who will jump at the chance to work for the CIA. IRS. Or FBI, or a business competitor who wants to put a recruit's mean boss and of bosiness, a false flag is not only ountecessary.

However, even in those cases in which the una officer honestly admirs what organization or agency he represents, some deception is still in order. The small case officer will not use his real identity as give the recruit any information that would allow the recruit to identify him or learn anything about his personal life. It's always possible that the potential spy who appears so anxious to man spying for the case officer is, in fact, the bait set as a trap. It's also possible that the potential secroit will suddenly change his mind. In any case, the less that the recruit knows about the real person doing the recruiting, the better.

When the Recruitment Fails

There are no guarantees in life, and even the best-hid plans sometimes end disastrously. The recruit may recognize what is happening and immediately react to protect himself and those to whom he ones his loyalty. The target may break off contact, of he may go to his security officer, counterforelligence people, or the police. The worst-case seenante is one an which he continues to lead the recruiting man officer one either to entrap him or to feed him false information.

The possibility that the target will to doubled in an attempt to spread disinformation withe reason why close surveillance of the target should continue throughout the nation ment effort. If the potential recruit starts meeting secretly with other people, the recruiting officer and be assess the fast to know Failed, aborted, and doubled recruitments always pose a serious threat to the intelligence agency, the private intelligence case officer, or the private citizen who initiates an espirance operation. Therefore, recruitment plans must collinear include procedures to follow in the event of (silure as some betraya). The espionage officer must mean that the subject who rejects a recruitment attempt will report the attempt of his government, employer, as agency.

As soon as there is good reason to believe that the attempt at recruitment has failed, or will fail, the case officer and mothers engaged in the recruitment most break off all contains with the subject. Any masses points, such as office phone numbers or safe houses, must El shut down. The target have no way to make a sayone associated with the recruitment was the recruitment effort is abandoned. This is why it is so important at use a false identity when recruiting, aroun when the recruiter is honest about what government as organization the spy will be serving. Those responsible for espionage activity must be able to make a tredible denial if the target boes public or attempts to make a criminal charge.

In furnire attempts are made to recruit new subjects to the same target organization, the case officer must assume the target officers will be warned. The man false flag or man story should not attempt to make another potential source in that target approximation. This is why the CIA and other spy agencies often temporarily bring in a case officer assigned in another country for many every dury whenever they initiate a recruitment. If the recruitment fails, the exposed case officer can immediately leave the country, and there will be no chance that the man recruit will burne into the failed recruiter accidentally while walking through a shopping mall

I clover recruitment effort using a false flag was assentine enemy problems even when a fails by spreading misinformation. Say, for example, a KGB case officer pretends to be see American interested in a relationship in order to recruit a soong but homely woman working as a French atomic weathers production facility. When the woman's new layer times asking questions about weapon production, she goes to had security officer like she is supposed to. The French countennetalligence agency attempts to trap the som officer, but he pots the tail we the target recruit and disappears forever. The French government then commuts a great deal of time and attention trying to discover why the Americans are recruiting spres within the French nuclear production industry.

In a similar example from the world of private espionage, a case officer working for a large corporation attempted to recruit a spy inside a competitor's bookkeeping department by claiming to be working for the IRS and offering a sizable reward for the information he wanted the target to steal. The hunest employee instead told his boss about the attempt to reempt him. The boss was no longer such a threatening manupetitor because he was worned too much about a possible government investigation into his financial affairs.

Whenever abundaning a recruiting effort, the case officer should do everything possible in embarrass or discredit the uncooperative urget. He should expose any blackmail material, tell the failed recruit's wife about the girlfriend, anonymously report crimes to local police, and so on. The more trouble the failed recruit suddenly discovers in his life, the less likely he will be to spend time and effort trying to identify the man or woman who tried to man him into a spy. If a case officer can't recruit an enemy's luyal employee to spy for him, he can make suit will the employee tim's the happy worker he nace way.

Chapter Thirteen

The Basic Steps: Phase Two

passing intelligence to the case officer to make sure that the spy is delivering reliable information.

TESTING THE RECRUIT

The testing will minimum for as long as the recentred man provider intelligence information. The best way to test the new spy's celebrative is to check his information against known their. To do thus, the case officer tasks the pay with finding out specific information without letting him know that the man flicer already has that information.

For example. WR CIA may already have identified a mission of the surveillance photography. So the man officer asks mission may so steal a list of mission sites and then checks to make man the known site is on the list provided by the apy. If what the apy provides doesn't jibe with what the case officer amove to the true, the new agent may be a list, a plant, or just poor source of information. Regardless of the reason for his inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list, a plant, or just inaccuracy, he is not credible, and if the situation cannor may be a list.

Although stolen information can almost siways be verified during the early service of the recruited spy, as the spy provides more sensitive and unique information, it will be more difficult to test information provided by the agent against other tehable sources.

If possible, any espionage matters should recruit many than one spy inside the rarger organization. By operating a ring of spies, the case officer can check each spy's information against the information provided by other spies. Each spy should have an clue about which of his colleagues is also spying for the enemy. It's best to recruit different spies under different false flags using different case officers as the control for each apy.

Eventually, the best and most useful spy may be presiding intelligence information that it not available from any other source. This is the very reason why someone sets out as rectiff a spy— to learn something that cannot be learned any other way. On the other hand, such single source information was be extremely dangerous if it's misinformation.

Sometimes III information can III easily ventiled by the tesules. For example, the spy reports that the enems will attack Cortagena on Therefax, and the enemy does just that However, careful records must be kept of all information provided by the spy, and these must be checked against furnite events and other sources of information.

A rigorous scientific method must be followed in checking on the venters of the information provided. (I has information is indeed true, then all predictions of future events based on the stolen information will prove true. Even one prediction based an an agency information that doesn't check our manner raise serious doubts about the reliability in the agent. However, sometimes false predictions can be explained: "The prime minister changed his mind at the last minute and canceled the attack on Canagena because he discovered that the enemy had been alerted to the attack." Often, when mintelligence report proves false, the excuses affered by the spy can be checked out. If the explanation cannot be verified, the intelligence operations officer must exercise even greater care in testing future information the agent provides.

In all intelligence-collection efforts that rely in recruited spies, lying is a substant consideration. In one case in the 1950s, the CIA paid millions of dollars to a Chioese agent who claimed he was running a network of spies that he had recruited inside China. He claimed to agents were reporting on social conditions, anti-government activities, and manufactured their reports to the U.S. agent by secret entrespondence and radio transmissions.

In fact, the self-described private intelligence entrepreneur was lying. He based his reports on newspaper stories, public government documents, and propaganda broadcasts, and of which he collected ourside mainland China. He had me ring of spress no clandestine radio net, and no sources inside the People's Republic of China.

Because he was using many of the same sources that the CIA was—interception of radio and TV news programs and newspaper elipping services—the bogus spy's information generally tracked with what the CIA analyses already knew about Red China. By the time the CIA discovered themanion the information, the agency faced a massive task in cleanary man the thousands of files based on the faked information provided by the bogus spy. The "spy" disappeared—along with the millions he fall collected—and was never heard from Even worte, there is good evidence that the spy was working for the Republic of China in Taiwan; that is, he was telling U.S. intelligence what the Nationalist Chinese wanted the Americans to believe.

The fact that some information does check and is not unrefutable evidence that the warm is reliable. Dixinformation operations, such as when a spy is doubled and then used at pass false information to an enemy, always include factual information in a cover for the misinformation.

The three must dangerous mistakes an inselligence officer can make are as follows:

 To continue to accept unverified intelligence provided by a recruited spy after a piece of minimum has been proven false (This is especially dangerous if previous information from the source made the intelligence officer look good with his superiors.)

 To refuse to accept information provided by a rehable agent—one whose previous information this always checked nut—because the new information doesn't fit the officer's beliefs about what the enemy is doing in planning.

• To pressure the spy to provide intelligence that will verify the officer's unsubstantiated conclusions, which will likely just tempt the spit to create false intelligence to keep the phythems coming in. (The worst with a case officer can commit at an offer a spy a bonus it he produces intelligence confirming his own because theory. Never give a spy a reason to be to keep the case officer happy.)

The whole purpose of spying is to learn information that always our understanding ill what the energy is planning and will likely do.

WHEN INDEPENDENT VERIFICATION ISN'T POSSIBLE

All too often, it's impossible to verify information independently before deciding 1886 areas at take based on that information. Sometimes intelligence collection evolves to the point that there is no sum to verify a report, but if that information is acted upon, and it proves true, areas, is guaranteed; but if it proves false, disaster manne. This dilemma in why so many intelligence manners have turned to the polygraph examination as a way of testing receivited spies.

Fluttering the Recruit

The CIA and other government spy agencies often include the polygraph as one part of their testing process. The recruit with usually only submit in a polygraph examination ofter the recruiting process is completed and he malives that he is indeed spying on his own government, employer, or friends. Once he realizes his predicament, however, the spy usually he is chosen other than agreeing to be fluttered, provided the case officer and arrange a way to set it up. (The spy usual is being paid to supply secrets and refuses to be fluttered in most likely lying.)

Some polygraph experts, the bonest ones, will admit that the polygraph is really a psychological tool rather than a machine that measures truth. Anyone who understands what a polygraph will or will not do can often heat the machine. It heatest work much better than a com flip as a he detector for many people, including those who have the most experience telling lies. When the machine does work, it works as often as not because the subject doesn't date tell a lie out of fear that machine will cetch lam.

There are several books that describe techniques on how to bear the machine, and many intelligence agencies instruct their employees and unmetimes even their agents on these techniques. Rick Ames passed two polygraph tests while he was making indians of dollars selling out U. 8, spies to the KGB.

Polygraph examinations are expensive, they require trained personnel, and the secruit must go to some secret locations such as a safe house, or even take a trip to shother counts to be can be fluttered. Even so, if the case officer has the mans of fluttering a rector, it is worthwhile doing so, at long in the case officer understands that the polygraph was the case part of the drama of recruming and evaluating the some a scenario designed to make the rector believe that his lies will be discovered and he will be punished.

This seems can affect a recruit so much that a private intelligence operator may want to arrange a fake polygraph examination if he doesn't have the budget and usined personnel for the real thing. Most people have never seen a polygraph machine, so it's a simple exercise to assup something that looks like a polygraph session does on television. Have up the subject, and let someone ask him a bunch of questions. In such a con it is surprising how often the subject will tell the truth because he thinks the can't fie without getting caught, or all will get so nervous that an interrogator won't need a lie detector to spot the lies be tells.

What the intelligence officer should never do is accept the word of the recent based on the supposed results of a poly-graph examination. The truth can only fill determined examining whether the information provided proves true. If not, then the recruit was lying as someone fill to lum, no matter what the machine rold fill polygraph examiner

Verification by Friendly Interrogation

Intelligence officers who understand the fallier of depending on the polygraph rely more in the techniques of friendly interrogation to test their manus. Each time a case officer meets with a rectuit in a situation that permits a frank exchange of information, but interrogates the recruit in great detail about his collection of intelligence information.

When a friendly interrogation is done right, the subject may not even realize that he is being interrogated, but instead conclude that the conversation demonstrates the case officer's interest in and concern about the subject's daily activities and the risks he is taking by apying.

If good source-verification interrogation will take several hours (or even several days) with the some officer (or better, a trained interrogation officer) encouraging the massis to take about anything and everything dealing with his daily life and his spy activities.

If at all possible, the entire conversation should be recorded without the spy's knowledge. It's even better if the interview is in be secretly videotaped. The more detail the recruit provides in answering questions, the heater. The man officer wants to learn such things as to whom the retruit has been talking, the dates and time of day such meetings took place, where the meetings took place, who else attended, and what they are. Every question should be asked in several different ways, but they should interspersed throughout the dialogue and not be sequential

After such an interrogation, the case officer, the interrogater and the support intelligence staff must go over the entire conversation, word for word, looking for possible contradication and making specific comparisons with the answers to the seaso question asked in different page.

Telling her is a lot harder than telling the truth, and only an eleverest of decrivers can temember all the details necessor to make a lie hold together over a long interrogation. Most little den't plan a story thoroughly, as they must create the details on the fly, which makes it exact harder is remember the little the they told two days ago. Most often is will be the little details that alert the case officer that the receive is lying.

Perhaps the secrait describes a visit to a nuclear plant, and when asked a question about the weather, he reports it was a minor and When the case officer checks a weather report, he discovers that the day was heavily overcast. Maybe the recruit mentions that one of his sources was drinking a martini dution; one meeting. When the threadly interrugator asks several bears what what drinks were served on the meeting, the recruit, who has already forgotten what his said earlier, reports that everyone was drinking scotch.

Give a suspected first a chance to talk, act in if you believe every word he says, and ask lots of questions. Sooner in later the first will trip himself up.

TRAINING THE RECRUIT

Every we will eventually require some training in the craft of spying—such things as the use of miniature and specialized eamens, coded writing, computer encryption programs, radio transmissions, surveillance-detection techniques, dead drops, and escape and evasion ratios. How much training is necessary will depend on the sophistication of the rargeted organization, how the spy is collecting the information he steals, and what personal experience and technical information he brings in the table when he agrees to spy.

Obviously, if the recruited spy is an employee of another spy agency, he will need to exercise extreme manual associating the counterintelligence security apparatus that routinely searches for evidence of manual atmong its same employees. On the other hand, the secretary retruited in spy in a small business executive may have little reason to fear exposure and thus need only minimal instruction on the practical aspects of spying.

The training may range from no more than a couple of hours of instruction or a safe house to an extended my man neutral third country with long days of specialized instruction. Training also provides opportunity to more the relationship between the recruited agent that the control apparatus, to tempt the recruit with future rewards, and in make him feel like he now belongs to a close-knit organization. We will protect him in the event things go wrong.

Special emphasis should be given in the training session on the techniques used to pass both accurations to the spy that the intelligence collected by the recentled spy back of the case officer

Arangements should also be made for handling payments, and the training officer must emphasize the need for discretion in how the money earned from spying is spent. The training session should address the question of how to explain sudden wealth—or, better, how to linde it. Rick Ames told his colleagues in the CIA that he had married a Colombian woman who had inherited a great deal of money from her father. (The truth was that Rick's father-in-law left no wealth when he died and Rick spent a good share of his immentations spying in the support of the mother-in-law in Colombia.)

Often, people who are recruited as spies discover they enjoy the secreey and the excitement of showing up others, especially those whom they think have underestimated their abilities or may advantage of them. Good case officers play on this. There may well be as need for secret drops, complicated plans for spotting surveillance, or secret passwords, but dramatics in both the training and use of such skills on a regular basis will serve to keep and recruited spy interested in the game.

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL HANDLING OF A RECRUITED SPY

Eventually, the recruit will realize that he is apying on those who trust him. At this point, the suitogate recruiter should pass full control of the recruit to the name officer, if that has not aheady been done. This passing of control should appear to be a natural result of the recruitment process in most cases, the recruiter should set up a meeting with the person who will came as the regular case officer. "This is one wite, who is passed to help in solve out problem," or "This is the man I told you about, the one who will be paying you from now on " If the recruit has a dependent relationship with the original recruiter, especially if it involves a sexual relationship, the man officer may must be keep that relationship above, at least for a short period or until the case officer can manipulate the recruit into a new dependency on the case officer.

At some point, the case officer should guarantee the safe of the recruit and his family. It is not important whether the parantee is valid, what is important is that the recruit believes the guarantees is valid. (A good case officer will engage in any deception—no matter how cruel or false it may be—if the deception ensures the cooperation of the recruit.) The more convinced the recruit is thus his spying will am result to personal tragedy for himself or his family, if he day what the rate officer domands, the better spy he will be. (There is nothing wrong with letting the spy believe that if he fails to do what the case officer demands, he will be nostril-deep in using water.)

Each recruited agent requires personal handling. The spy may want a buddy, a confessor, a mother, a leader, a layer, or a general. At the same mass the case officer must keep 100 own emotions under eight control at all sizes and never allow himself to develop any kind of emotional attachment at 100 tecruit. The case officer has to play the great friend and buddy while mentally building a wall that will allow him to use the remust in an effective manner without worrying about the consequences, even if that requires placing the rectuit in extreme danger. Yet, he must keep the rectual from ever recognizing that he is being exploited in the most typical manner.

The case officer should watch for signs of stress and the ready to reassure the rectail whenever necessary Praise can be very important, especially for those who become spress for idealogical reasons. The CIA made Oleg Penkovsky a secret U.S. citizen and a colonel in the U.S. Arms. The KGB made John Walker an admiral in the Soviet navy, even though Walker's motivation for spring was pure greed.

At some point money almost always becomes a part of the equation. Paying a recton works both as a reward and as a means of control, but determining how much to pay him can be tricky. The pay isn't based us what the information is really worth, but rather what the recton can absorb must his lifestyle without making it obvious has take a new source in meone. No ease officer wants a recourt's sudden wealth to go off his boss that the employee may be working for assumes else. The money should be enough to be an important source of new luxury in the recruit's life, but not us much that it draws the attention of his friends, relatives, and colleagues.

If at all possible, the man officer should get a signature on receipts for any money passed to the recruir in payment for information. (The case officer can always blame the necessity for a receipt me superiors who don't ross birm.) Such evidence can later be used to threaten in agent who wants in back out of his agreement to spy. Once a person has turned traitor, he should always fear the possibility that the control officer will betray him if he doesn't meet the demands the control officer makes.

Payments don't have in he made directly to the recruit. Phillip Ages reports that in Mexico, the GIA supported the mistresses of government officials, paying for their rent, automobiles, and shopping hills. The advantages of such a deal are obvious. There is im paper minney trail leading directly to the recruit He gets the luxuries he wants without having roworry about hiding a rich bank account. In a similar way, a case officer might pay off gambling debts, provide vacuation accommodations, pay tor arriting tiefters, cover the expenses of a nursing home for a recruit's mother, or buy property in a foreign counting and register it in the recruit's name.

Once recruited, a spy may continue providing intelligence material for many mean. Every intelligence agency has employers who follow career paths that will eventually result in promise and transfers. That means that a case officer in most reasonable collection operations will sooner or that have to transfer the spies to the been running to a new case officer.

Souls a change of case officers presents special problems.

Differences, the agent will have developed a deep emotional attackment to the case officer and won't keep the idea that he being handed off to some stranger.

The original case officer is responsible for preparing the secretar for his new handler. He should offer credible explanation about why he can no longer handle the agent, explanation is shortfit under the filter flag the case ufficer has been using. The old sum officer must beef the new case officer on everything there is to know about the spies he will all inheriting.

Sometimes want the best preparation work won't make the recruit feel comfortable with his new control officer. Also, it sometimes happens that the recruit no longer wants to conunue spying and the look at the change of transfers in his change to break loose. In this situation, signed receipts, bank account tocoids, photographic evidence of meetings, and recorded conversations are be very important. All spies are subject to the ultimate form of blackmail: the knowledge that they can be exposed to those they have betrayed.

Even when a case officer must openly threaten a maj to keep him producing, the case officer should try to shift the blame to some third party. "I'd let you go, but I'm in the same fix you are. The people who control me won't let either of us go. Neither of us has any choice, unless we may willing to go to juil, or suffer something worse."

TERMINATION

All things come to an end, and every recruitment plan should include plans for terminating the arrangement with the spy. The successful man officer will always be the one who decides that the relationship with a spy should end. Spies don't get to quit on their own. Even so, when a control officer decides to cut a spy loose, it goes much more smoothly if the spy can be convinced that the decision was mutual or even his own. That is easy to altange if the spy wanted out but didn't dage because of fear of what the case officer would do if he tried to part.

It gets more difficult when the spy enjoys what he is doing and the money he is making. Agents recruited under false flags can usually be terminated with less trouble than agents who know the true identity of those for whom they may working. The case officer who terminates matagent recruited under a false flag must make sure that he will not tun into the agent in a public place in a situation in which the agent can learn who the case officer really is. This will be easier to do if the case officer knows a good deal about material terminated agent—his life-style, the place he works, and where he bangs out in his free time. If the case officer should accidentally meet the terminated agent on the street or somewhere che, he must be ready in instandy assume the false-flag role he played when he may running the agent. The longer a case officer works in any given area, the more likely such an accidental exposure becomes. This is one teason why most internstional apy agencies man their agents into new territories every two to four years.

The case officer should make the termination at easy at possible. He should not say anything critical of the agent's work, even if he knows the agent has been making up his intelligence. It stead, he should offer excuses that blame someone up the line in the intelligence agency, budget problems, or even the case officer's own career problems.

Whether is a false-flag recruitment or the recruited agent knows who he is spying for, if the spy min motivated by greed, he won't be happy with the sudden loss of income and mine even my to fake more important intelligence to heep the money coming in. When possible, the case officer should pay the terminated agent mine kind of lump wire to case the blow. If the case officer has a file of evidence that the minim wouldn't want the people he has been apying on in know about, the case officer min make a few veiled threats at the same time he makes the payoff. It works best if the spy is told how long he will be apying at the outset and what kind of seventing he will be paid when his services are in longer needed.

If the expertation is that the recruit will only be spying for a short time, perhaps only several weeks, then it's best to include an offer of a substantial bonus at the time of recruitment to be paid once the spy has completed the work.

International spy agencies often employ agency for many years, especially those recruired as access and supply agents. The CIA offers such agents retirement benefits and cometimes even an opportunity to immigrate to the United States for their retirement years. Government case agents woully offer the same kinds of benefits to primary agents who are engaged in the direct collection of intelligence under high-risk circumstances, especially those who become moles. Unfortunately, few such agents have ever fixed long enough at collect their promined retirement benefits.

The worst kind of termination is when the recruit is caught spying. When that happens, the primary consideration of the case officer with be to prittee himself and the intelligence agency that employs him. I be case officer should only attempt to rescue the spy if he can do in without risking $10 min operational safety. In many cases, the case officer provides the spy an escape plan that he can use if he learns $11 in about in he arrested. But almost any escape plan must be initiated before the spy is arrested. Even then, the discovered spy $11 be on his own during the initial flight, at least until he crosses a frontier of makes it in a safe house controlled by the case officer.

If the recruitment is done under a false flag, it's quite likeby that any escape plans previously discussed with the recruit will include promises that cannot be fulfilled. There was no way that Rashid Yann could have ever arranged for the Silvermans to immigrate to Israel (see Chapter III.

Nevertheless, even when a recruitment is done under a false flag, it is much better if the recruit can avoid capture and prosecution. Yasin probably did have a bundle of cash said take documents ready to give tryin Silvernian, along with many suggestions on how they could hade our nots! "I man arrange transportation to Israel." Unfortunately for the Silvermans, things fell apart too quickly, and Yasin had to save his nwn skin.

If a spy tectoited under a false flag as captured, every mornber of the intelligence team should break off fill contact with fill. All offices, telephone numbers, safe houses, drops, and message centers should be immediately closed down, and are evidence pointing to the man identity of the manning or sum of the agents should be cleaned up and destroyed.

Remember, the whole purpose of tecruming a spy is to steal information that the enemy doesn't know you have Every remination should be designed in ensure that the theft of the intelligence remains a secret. If that can't be schieved, then the goal is to make sure that the case officer in not identified and captured.

The Security Aspect

nee a case officer has recruited a spy, he must take every possible precaution at ensure that the people who am the target of the intelligence collection do not least that they have a spy in their midst. He must make sure that should the target's counterespionage officers discover that there might be a spy in the organization, they cannot trace and spy back to the case officer or even vertical as existence.

THE THREE STEPS TO SECURITY

The case officer must set up procedures for handling the spy that accomplish the following objectives:

- Establish security procedures that the recruit will follow to avoid attracting attention to himself as he steals information
- Establish secure methods of communication between the case officer and the spy
- Reduce personal contacts between the case officer and the spy to the absolute minimum required in maintain discipline, morale, and operadoral technique

ESTABLISHING SECURITY PROCEDURES

Most recruits solicit advice from their case officers on how to go about collecting intelligence without getting caught. If at all pussible, the num officer should not simply recommend security procedures for the recruit but also arrange training for him in methods to avoid detection consistent with the security threat under which he will operate.

The Busies of Stealing Secrets

The safest method for stealing secrets mane in which the spy participates in or cavesdrips on conversations during the matter of his legitimate workday, or in his ordinary associations with the targets of the intelligence operation. The spy may attend occupies where intelligence information is discussed, regularly overhear conversations near the deak where he works, or type up secret reports for the boas. In addition on what he hears and sees, the spy on the inside will have regularly overhear containing sensitive information. He might hold such documents in his private office during work hours and perhaps even in as office rafe. He may even that documents home in work on

This is tow-risk appeng because the spy is doing his job or playing and tole and the source expects him at play. This is why Rick Ames are such a dangerous spy. He went to work every day and did exactly what he was supposed to do—and then told the KGB what is may that he had found and learned while on the job. The better such a spy plays the role of the loyal, hardworking (but not particularly ambitious) employee, or the grand but not demanding lover, the more to becomes the invisible person who makes a perfect spy.

Alternatively, the spy who has a close of intumam relationship with a primary source of information—perhaps a mistress or a lover—will get information by listening to the source brag about his work on by eavesdropping and going through documents the source leaves lying around. The risks of disenvery increase when the spy must exvesdrop on conversations he is not supposed to hear, such as a moreous listening in on phone conversations or a chauffeur rewring a connection so that he can listen to conversations in the backseat teven when the passengers have turned off the intercom). This risky but often necessary behavior includes deliberately gaming makes to documents the spy would not normally see as the course of a workday. A secretary neight list documents on the boss' desk while he's in the hathroom, a file clerk might search through file cabinets that belong to an officer, or a chauffeur might open a briefcase left on the backseat while the employer goes to a meeting.

These kinds of spies will need the most advice from their control officers, not just on how to steal secrets, but also on how to keep their activities hidden, how to protect what they have stolen from discovery, and how to deliver such material safely to the control officer.

In such situations the spy should never steal documents, but should instead copy them of photograph them. If that is impossible, the spy should read the documents and write a summary from memory as quickly as possible.

The spy should also always have a story ready that explains why III are identally overheard a convenation or many document. I'm sorry, I didn't realize you were me the line. I saw going to call Nancy in security and suggest we do hach." If caught looking through papers on the boas' desk, a screetary might say. "I'm looking for the budget proposal. Did you pick it up?" Any mane explanation is better than no explanation, provided it is given without hesitation.

Remembering What You Have Learned

The spy doesn't just have to worry about gerting caught while eavesdropping or reading a document he is unable to photocopy. He must also remember what he has heard or sometimes for up to several hours, before he can find an opportunity to write the details down. Therefore, is in critical for the spy to develop the ability to memorize large quantities of information.

Memorization in a talent and can and, indeed, must be practiced. Good spies must develop good memories, and it's the responsibility of the case officer to encourage and help them to do in. Exercises in manufacture techniques should be included in any training provided in the spy. Here's a simple memorization exercise.

Watch and videotape a television news brundeast, political debate, at a serious discussion of any kind. Wait 30 minutes, then write out a detailed report of everything you can remember. Include descriptions of the people who spoke, backgrounds, and any action observed, including unintended subconscious actions (like someone brushing back a loose strand of hair). Replay the tape several times noting all the things you missed in your original report. Do the same thing with additional programs over and over notifyour quantum improves.

As soon as he is alone and can safely do so, the spy should write out complete, detailed summanes of any relevant mon versations or documents. Perhaps the last way to the this is to dictate into a tape recorder and then make that the report, making and necessary changes as the memory is enhanced to the recording.

if there is any chance that such notes might be discovered, the spy should use nume kind of "invisible" or coded writing. This can range from such old spandbys as lemon jurce, which is then exposed to heat in make it appear, to a variety of invisible inks that me commercially available

Recording Conversations and Copying Documents

Obviously, it's better if the spy mm record a conversation of make a copy of a document. This is a much higher-risk situation than eavesdropping or socaking a peek. If someone in caught taking pictures of documents in work in wearing a min to a confidential meeting, there is no story in 100 world that will convince the security officer that the suspect is engaging in an innocent activity. Indeed, most government agencies that the classified information prohibit employees from taking personal cameras to their office. Even so, it's easy to learn to use a manature camera; there are a number of such cameras on the market, and every case officer should supply such a camera to his receives along with instructions in its use. There are also mini-cassette recorders that can be hidden in a pucket and carried into a meeting.

Nowadays, every office has a photocopying machine. The more security conseques the office environment, the more different it will be to use the machine during work hours for apying Still, many spics that that the causest way to make copies of a document is to copy is at the office.

Smart spies don't take just the document they want to copy to the copy machine. They hade it me a pile of regular work or same personal material, e.g., invitations and party or a limit's homework. Getting caught using the office equipment to personal work may earn a reprimand, but it will all a lot less senious than what would happen if the security officer knew shout the top-secret alert the hidden under the child's fraving of a witch

When documents cannot be copied in the location they in kept, and spy may have to remove the documents to a safe page, copy them, and then return them to their storage area. This is such a high-risk behavior that the case officer should personally approve such them. determining first if the intelligenment worth risking the permanent loss of the spy.

Despite the inherent danger in removing documents from in office, the spy can probably ger away with it because the office managers get was relaxed about security. Time and the Pve watched government bureaucrats make photocopies of secret documents stamped with clear warnings that no copies were to be made. They did it not because they were spies but because they wanted every person in a meeting to have a copy of the document instead of having to pass it around. In such a lart security situation, a spy might well be observed copying secret documents and still may be chaltenged. In his years at a spy, John Walker repeatedly made photocopies of code books and earned them home in his briefcase and never came close to getting caught. (Walker was finally caught when his ex-wife, who had known about the spying for years, turned him in an the FBL)

Computers on Spy Tools

The use of computers has totally changed the nature of spying, mostly to the advantage of the spy. The castest document of all in steal is a document stored in binary format in a computer, provided you have access in the computer and know how is access the information. It takes only the right kind of floppy disk and a few seconds alone in copy the desired file to the floppy disk.

Most computer serial programs are designed as keep strangers out of the system, but the whole purpose of recruiting 2 apy is to have someone who has access to a system. The hetter security programs have a compartmentalized network that requires passwords in access the most sensitive information. However, a knowledgeable computer expert and often hack men such reserved areas. Better yet for the apy those who have access to the sensitive areas of the network are often extremely careless in keeping passwords secret. They must write passwords down in a notebook; use easily discovered prasswords such as their mothers names, their addresses, or their birth dates; or get sloppy about checking to make sure their shoulders when they log in

Anyone who intends to me an espionage operation against minimum modern organization should be thoroughly familiar with computers and should train their recruits in the use of computers. A justicer on chapifleur everyone assumes is computer allocated may gain access to the arganization's computers at allocated the day when he can however through hard disks and network directories with minimum risk of discovery. I predict that, increasingly, the best spy of all will be the individual who has access in the organization's computer data disks.

It is not only easy to steal intelligence documents off a computer, it is also easy a smuggle the stolen documents out of the office. Computer floppy disks can be hidden in a pocket, slipped into the lining of a cost, taped to the inner rhigh, or put some an envelope and mailed not of the building. The information can even be encrypted, then sent out as e-mail in the spy's home computer.

Computers at the spy's home or workplace can also be used as hiding places for stolen digital information.

The techniques of using computers as any tools and protocting the integrity of the files are far beyond the scope of this book. Any intelligence agent intending to use a computer as part of an intelligence-collection operation should get through the following checklist:

- Don't save or store any documents you want to keep secret on the hard disk or a floppy disk with no encryption.
   Always work on plain text documents in RAM memory and encrypt before storing the information on disks.
- Always use a total cross program when deleting any sensitive ses from a hard or floppy disk that you or your spy controls.
- Keep all sensitive information in enerypted inernation floppy disks rather than the hard disk drive and have a hiding place for such disks that is located as far from the computer as is practical. Take the disks out of hiding only when working in them and return them in their hiding place immediately when you're finished.
- Most encryption are not sold on the market can be easily broken, including many that advertise they can't be broken. Many of the encryption systems bundled with word processor software are not secure. Know what makes an encryption program trustworthy.

- Even if you are sum you have the best encryption program available, double-encrypt everything, using two different systems.
- If you are sending messages by modern, always use an encryption system based on the RSA analog and a public key code. Among the best of these programs is Pretty Good Privacy, which can be found on many computer bulletin boards for free
- Change passwords frequently. The great advantage of the RSA encryption system at that the public key passwords can be changed daily and given see an open message.
- Be aware that it is possible as used a competer common from a distance of up to several hundred feet with equipment that can be put together in a garage. Always take steps as ensure your computer is isolated and electromagnetic crosssors are incommanded.

If you don't understand what I'm talking about in any of the above points, don't put your meet in computers until you do. If you do understand what I am talking about, you will not make he able to use computers with some degree of confidence, but you will be able to quickly and easily and computer data off the computers of most people using them

Hiding Stolen Documents, Reports, and Computer Disks

The spy must have a scente place to the reports, photos, film, documents, computer disks, and anything else to might steal until they can be safely delivered to the case officer. The spy should identify hiding places that include both places where he can store material for several weeks and quickly stash something in an energency.

The more permanent storage place might be a hidden flour safe at the spy's home, a safe deposit box in a local bank, a tenred storage space, a watertight bux buried in the backyard, a hiding spot in an attic or a basement, or a hollowed-our spot in a wall.

The spy should identify at least one temporary hideaway in every location where he will be holding material for any period of time, even for a few minutes, in case — unexpected to a few minutes.

The temporary hiding place may be nothing more than a desh drawer with a false hottom or a picture on the wall with an envelope mounted on the back. It might be a throwing in a corner, a piece of upholstered furniture with a small slit in the fabric, an envelope taped to the bottom side of a desk mile drawer, a plastic bag in a toiler tank, a hollowed-out book on a bookshelf, a large vase filled with artificial flowers, or even a piece of outgoing mail, stamped and addressed to a nonexistent person. Such quickie hiding places will not survive a thorough search by a professional investigator, but if a spy is singled out for that kind of treatment, his cover has already been blown.

The ability to hide material is 50 important that every intelligence collector should make it a habit to identify such hideaways automatically when he enters a toom, even if he doesn't have anything to hide at the moment.

ESTABLISHING SECURE COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN THE CONTROL OF FIGER AND SPY

The higher the security threat level, the greater the problems associated with personal meetings between the case officer making under embassy cover in China assumes that the Chinese counterintelligence agency will have burn under surveillance around the clock. The same applies for a KGB officer working out of the Soviet Embassy in Washington, D.C. So in such cases, the case officer many personally meet with a spy in controls only once every two or three years.

On the other hand, a tobacco company intelligence officer who is gathering information on an antismoking political action group doesn't have to warry an much that someone might spot him meeting with his spy inside the target group. Yet, even in this relatively secure situation. We less the people being spied on know about the case officer and his manners with the spy, the better the security.

Fortunately, when personal contact between the me is entitled (during the recruitment phrase), the recruit will not be doing any actual spying and the risks of the operation being discovered are not as great to they will eventually be. Once the spy starts providing intelligence, he will realize that he is engaged in a dangerous activity and will be analous to avoid detection. Therefore, he will probably concur that he should limit further contact with the same officer to occasional incentings and that he must exercise extreme section in property atoler information up to the case officer.

Although a case officer should handle his spice from as great a distance at its feasible. Its must also establish a seaton for the apy to pass information to the case officer and for the apy to receive queries, instructions, stall payments. This is when both the apy and his case officer are most volnerable to identification and capture. Therefore, then officers working to dangerous circumstances, such as someone apying on the CIA for the KGB, so to great lengths to limit the direct contact between a case officer and the sps. (For example, while spying III the KGB, John Walker met with his control once even two in three years.)

Committeetons between entirol fact pag in high-risk saturations are often limited to some variation of publicly posted messages and the use of dead drops. Publicly posted messages are coded and placed in locations had tell either the man officer or the spy that a certain planned manual should be taken. Such messages might be an advertisement to a newspaper, a poster on a bulletin board in a supermarket, a piece of guiffur at wall, or a chaik mark on something that can be seen from the street. A dead drop is a place where documents, films, money, and other materials can be left by one party and picked up by another party with no direct contact between them.

KGB case agents operating in the United States during the Cold War preferred public mailboxes as the place to past a coded command. When Rick Ames had documents to pass to his KGB control officer, he would make a chalk mark on one of three different drop boxes strusted on corners on his toute to and from work. The mark would be a cross, a triangle, or some other simple design. The KGB case officer would drive by each of the letter boxes once a week or so. Whenever he was the coded mark, he would know that Ames had something in deliver. He would then wipe the mark off the mark had so in a signal that he had seen the mark.

When Ames are that his message had been received, he would take the packet of material to a dead drop he had already been told about. The KGB case agent handling Ames provided detailed instructions on the location of dead drops—including photos of the spot marked with a felt in a greate pen. The pictures and the text showed where to find the designated dead drop, which might be a hollow tree or a metal how hidden behind a rock in a wooded area or thick bush.

I complar dead drop arrangement is used by the case officar to deliver materials or information to the spy—e.g., special instructions for acting up a face-to-face meeting, may payment owed to the spy, and detailed directions for where the next head drop would be Naturally, both parties have to exerters extreme caution in approaching a dead drop to ensure that they are not under surveillance.

There are hundreds of different ways for posting disguised messages in public places. An advertisement in a newspaper's personal section might read, "John, Marsha still loves you," but mean, "I have information for any to collect at the drop." The disguised message could just as easily be semething in the lost-and-found section. "One black dog who answers to Red." could really mean "You have a drop waiting it post red."

During World War II, the British government regularly passed information to again behind German lines by coded announcements on the BHS short-wave broadcases. Other ways of posting public messages include arranging the curtains on a window in a special way, leaving a rai parked facing down the driveway instead of up, putting an item such as a child's toy in a car window while the car is parked in its usual place during the workday, or even wearing a particular item of clothing, say a hat or a topcoat not work at other times.

Lower-Threat Security Situations

Recruiting and managing spies in low-threat involving private parties or commercial businesses will generally not involve the sense of communications procedures just described Nevertheless, there is always a chance that the target of the spy operation will identify the recruit as someone who may be spying against it. If that happens, the target magnitude that the spy and identify who is recently. If stolen material. Therefore, in even a low-threat incomes, and case officer must are allow any one to identify him as someone who has mental contract with the apy it he has no good reason to the parties with him.

Direct Visual Contact

When dealing in a summary situation in which there is inall chance that Ital intelligence target could identify in a control officer as an intelligence collector. It case officer can set up occasional visual contacts under excumstances in which makes the rectuit in the case officer can instate. Its contact when both are in the same area, if there is a feed for such more. Itself approaches should appear in he a pair of the regular life-style to the same church every Standay, and lunch to the same testaurant once a week, regularly attend movies at the same theatre of tent videox at the same store, and in a park so the same time each day, or on the same supermarket for weekly shopping. The case officer and the recruit in stop and talk to each other for a few more and when they meet, passing verbal small har or a park forch as required. They might even pick

In more security-sensitive situations, the case officer might arrange a simple series of visual signals that can be communicated if wanteer is desired in he and his spy pass each the: of spot one another errors a room of an open area. These kinds of signals are limited only by the imagination of the case officer and the setting of the assignation.

In one example, an intelligence entrepreneur who worked for a major manufacturing firm recruited a spy inside the tegronal Occupational Safery and Health Administration (OSHA) office. The spy's sole responsibility was recollect any information as employee complaints filed against the companion of the companion of the companion of the companion of the spy was an avid appear on the case agent began jugging on the mass path as the spy's couple of times a week, but the agent as in the opposite direction Most of the time they would pass each other without even a nod or a timbe of recognition.

Whenever and apy had something to pass me be would wear a college aweatcher when he jogged but would give me indication 55 knew the time officer when they passed on the stail. The spy would put the information in a dead drop the neit day, hiding it in a plastic bag that he would town in a trosh an along the jogging path. Within minutes, the case agent would pick up the bag, retrieve the document as 12 jogged long, and then put an envelope with the payment in the bag and drop the bag into a second trash can along the way. The py would pick up the payment is 13 passed the second trash can on his way back home.

Each of the joggers had another special sweatshirt he would wear if he had something to talk about. When the joggers saw that signal, they would pull or and stop m a drinking contain along the way, taking time for a quick char, but they would never exchange any material m that time.

In other situations, wearing a wristwatch on the right hand might indicate a request for a private meeting or the need in deliver information. Placing specific items in a shupping cart, carrying a magazine under a specified and, wearing a har or may wearing a har, removing and cleaning a pair of glasses, dropping something and then picking it up, or crossing one's legs while strong on a park bench and it is arranged signals between the agent and his app. The messages and the codes should be kept as simple as possible, hunted to pretty much the following kinds of statements:

- I have quiterial to pass to more
- We need to meet so we can fall.
- I am being followed
- You have a rail.
- · Everything a nkay

Both the exemistances and the specific ender used should its vanco, and whenever he makes a drop, the case officer should pass on new assencences to be followed until the next drop.

Making - Eveluance

There are many different ways to make exchanges in low-threat accurry satustions without allowing anyone to use the apy and the case officer exchange anything. For instance, the apy might follow the control officer into a bathroom, where such enters a stall. The apy passes a package of stolen secrets under the stall will to the case officer. He remains seated until the unpufficer has left the bathroom with the package. Or two people, each currying briefeases, board a bus as two different stops. They stand or the man each other. When more of them gets off the bus, no one nonces that they have swoched successes.

Couriers

Some intelligence officers prefer in use counters, usually service agents, to carry information back and forth between someone already inside the social circle of the recruit, but is a person whom the man officer recruited separately. Sometimes a massive may be the person who first helped entrap the recruit, such as the woman who started sleeping with him or the man who loaned him money. Sometimes a counier will be unfamiliar to and with the recruit and the material he in carrying back and forth. A case officer might even use a professional messenger service. However, all material sent by courter or messenger must first be encoded in some way.

Postal Service

Although seldem discussed in the literature of apying, the mailman delivers a good percentage of the communications spies and their recruits. The most officer will tent of post office box, a commercial mailbox, or sometimes a small apparament or business office that will also serve as part of his false-flag cover. This allows the apy to mail whatever he has all case officer

It may even be possible for the spy to use the postal system of ME business, government, or embassy office. All the spy has to do is drop a letter with a take return address into a mailbox. Two days later, the case officer can pick up the information at his post office box, which is rented in a fake name and home address. For additional security, the man officer will not pick up his mail personally, but rather send a service agent who will follow standard surveillance detection and avoidance procedures before and after he has picked up the mail.

The mail can be used both ways. The magair can also tent his own post office of commercial mailbox to which the case efficer can send him mail.

It may may be necessary for the recruit to bother with private mailboxes, especially in the United States. Because of the massive amount of junk mail that is dumped into every mailbox in the country, it is man for a man officer to send messages to a spy that madesigned to look like junk mail. The piece in junk mail could be an anxiamon for a "free mp" in Las Vegas, in obvious sweepstakes seam, a solicitation to buy stocks or a time-share apartorent, or any of the other seams used by direct-mail pitch actises. Only the teening and recognize the piece of mail as a message from his coursel officer Such a scheme new men involve secret writing passing in mail. The the message of perhaps wiping the page with a chemical solution will bring our the secret message written in the margins.

Telephone Communications

The number of dails continuous attents which sensitive commercial, government. The personal information is eachanged numbers in the tens of millions. Business executives discuss multibillion-dellar contracts, police officers talk about an opening drop boar, and thousands of men amounts are up rendezvous for adulters every day and never have any team about being tapped. At low-shreat security leases the case officer and the feature will probably talk from time to time on the telephone blowever, invoice engaging in any illegal activity that a great the discussing that returns an open phone line.

Despite both the legal and technical difficulties, governments can intercept and listen in on phone lines. 200 they will do not if they have enough reason to focus on a single individual. If a government agency suspects that one of their employees is spying, and of the first things they will do is request relephone mentals and put a pass register order on the line. A pen register fosed by police) will record 20 the numbers that any given telephone dials. Such a technical step, which is done at the relephone cachange rather than where the spy is located, does not require a court order. Therefore, once a spy comes under suspicion, law enforcement officers will quickly he able to identify every number 30 calls in the future and all long-distance numbers 30 has called in the past. At many point, the government will get enough evidence to obtain a warrant for a phone tap. Well-financed criminal organizations and large corporations can also usually find a way to tap a line, even though they will have to break the law to do it.

tuyone engaging in spying in high-risk situations should use experie caution whenever talking on the telephone and must assume that concern is listening to every word.

Whether one is an intelligence ufficer of just an ordinary east the following list of telephone security rules will keep ansone out of trouble.

- Don't ever discuss any illegal activity over any telephone to which you are known to have access. If you must make a call for such a purpose, make it from a public phone to a public phone. This means that attangements must be made advance so that the part is receiving the phone call will monitoring the public phone when it might.
- Whenever many a public phone or making sensitive calls from a private line, either pay with come or with a prepaid long-distance card, which can be purchased anonymously in supermarkers. Grupatores, and even the post office and cannot be traced to vote. (Remember that these prepurchased telephone cards can be used to make local calls, about as long-distance charges.)
- Remember that the easiest way to intercept and listen in on a telephone call is to pick up an extension.
- Don't discuss sensitive information, even your credit card numbers, over any cellular, cordless, or other type of phone that transmits a radio signal.
- Don't use elever code words of trite phrases, such mealing coaine "Coux Cola" of talking about going in a "fishing cop" when the planned activity is a recruiting session with a potential spy. If you find it necessary in talk in any kind of code, then you should be sending encrypted messages through the most suphisticated curryption systems available.
- If a phone must be used in an emergency, use a simple code to and the other party in go to a preaminged public or safe phone and stand by to receive a call or to call a preamanged number.

Using Computers and Modems for Secure Communications

Just as the author cannot address all the issues of using computers in data theft storage, and remeval, neither can be explain in this book all of the invandous of using computers for secure communications between a most officer and a recruited spy. Nevertheless, if the case officer and the recruit have access to a modern computer, a modern, and a telephone line, then the case officer will want to take advantage of the World Wide Web and e-mail.

Because all modern signals travel through commercial telephone lines, they present all the moral security problems that the relephone presents. Phone lines can easily its rapped by his enforcement officers or anyone who has access to the internal of the building or the phone connection box. People who tap phones will have competers and moderns, and Send an open message by modern and they was read it forms the addressed sequent.

Even so, computers and moderns saw make communications much more secure than a simple phone call, provided the operators understand the technology and the systems—as well as their limitations

E-Mail

The first advantage of computer and a second is e-mail. Anyone with an Internet connection or a connection to such commercial information services as CompuServe. America Online, in Prodigy can send make a message, non-place in the world, by connecting with a local number. Pen registers and phone records will show only the number of the Internet server or the information and

No e-mail message is secure unless it is encrypted with a sophisticated encryption program. It can be intercepted while-

It was the office nerwork, an the Internet, stored in the hard drives of the computer information service, and in transmission E-mail messages are also on the hard disks of every computer they pass through, often for long periods, even after they have supposedly been crased. Much of the Irangate means that so hadly damaged the Reagan administration's public image resulted because people like Lt. Col. Oliver North didn't realize how public e-mail can be and how complicated it is to erase e-mail as that it was never be recovered at any point along the line of transmission. No one should ever more anything on one open e-mail message that he wouldn't write down as a piece of paper and toss on the window for anyone to read.

Despite the times security risks, e-mail these provide a quick and easy way to post public messages, i.e., messages that appear to be innocent but are in fact ended instructions. Internet newsgroups, discussion groups on the commercial services, and thousands of private computer bulletin bourds provide places where anyone can post a message as part of an ongoing public discussion. Literally thousands of different cuts are continually debated in such open forums with little or no limitation on who are post a message in what can be said. Insults are traded back and forth, and a little of illogical numbers of flosts through ten discussions.

To ser up a system of public messages, both parties have to the following three things: 1) know the e-mail address or cover name each will be using, 2) agree on the public discussion group they will use and the coded wording to be used, and 3) know the time frame for checking messages. For example, the use officer thecks the news group altitude, guns on a daily basis, watching the a message posted by were dog@supercom.com. When he finds such a message and it includes the word tolt, he knows that there is a package warring for him at the drop site.

This is a much better means of posting public messages than busing an ad in a newspaper and running a coded message or making marks on mailboxes. Encrypted E-Mail

Some computer encryption programs make it possible to send e-mail messages in an encrypted former that may be as secure that even the National Security Agency's computers won't he able to break the encryption. Again, and such officer who duesn't know a manager encryption should not attempt to use computer encryption in a high-risk security surround But those who do understand this automic subject can send cmail to anyone in the world with a reusonable expectation that the message will be read only by the recipient.

Encrypted e-mail messages can be sent through title Internet. commercial computer formers services, possite bulletin beards, as direct complices to-computer phone connections

However, there is now senious problem with an encrypted message the more fact that it is entrypted will be seen as evedence that both parties are engaged in some kind of illegal. immoral, or disloyal behavior, if a government agency prets will an employee is spying and it may a line seal discovin that he is sending encrypted ungreases to someone, the bureauctats will take that as proof of apying

The way to avoid this problem is to take the same precontions that you do to Elk on the telephone Both parties and public phones, and if the calls are long-distance, they pay with either coms in better, the prepaid telephone cards Besides energotion, another advantage of computer communication is that both parties don't have to be on the line at the same time to communicate.

a scenario such as the following miles, work. Little Harder, a real estate speculator, recruits Dennis Powers, an engineer working for the City Highway Commission, to copy had may of the contr. mission's computer that describe future our highway consumers routes. On the first Saturday of each munth, Harden checks torus hotel under the more of Craig Beasily. He attaches the modern of his desktop computer to his from telephone and sets the computer software on that it will answer the phone when it rings. (Harden doesn't have to wait in the hotel morn for the call.)

BUNNING A RING OF SPIEN

Sometime during the day, Dennis Powers takes his notebook computer to the city zirpost where there is a courtesy office for business travelers. He connects his modern to the phone at a courtesy desk and, using his prepaid calling card, calls the horel and asks as he connected to Craig Beasily's toom When the compiler in the hotel toom answers, Dennis punches the right commands, and his computer downloads the latest stolen dam in entrypted format Harden's computer. He then downloads a file from Harden's computer, which pusses on instructions for future contacts. Later in the day. Harden picks up his computer and pays his hotel hill in cash.

REDUCING PERSONAL CONTACTS

Obviously, you should avoid personal contact as much as possible. But amon in high-risk situations, both the control offiyer that the reurum will occasionally have to meet (see-to-face. bornetimes, the spy was request such a meeting to ask for more money or explain why he can't produce everything the case officer expects of him. More often, it will be the case officer who will request the meeting, perhaps to provide some additional training and guidance, administer a polygraph test, or do an itelepth interview to evaluate the honesty of the apy's reporting.

The same officer must remain in control when it comes as meetings, even when it is the spy who is requesting the personal contact. The case officer must decide where and when a meet an how the recruit the travel to the meeting place. He should pick meeting places where he is totally familwith the layout and the ordinary traffic through the area.

Government intelligence was officers working as highrisk situations will prefer if at all possible, to hold meetings with recruited spies in a third country, preferably one in which the local government is more friendly toward the government who is running the spy. Remember that the Mossad seldom purs its man agents in a hostile Arab country. It recruits Atabs as spies while they are traveling in Western and and holds in meetings with such spies in friendly Western tries. In the man of Rick Ames, the KGB control officer would meet with him in Colombia white Rick and his wife were airing her mother.

Even those who are engaged in private intelligence collection are well advised to meet with the spies they control is another state, another region of the country, or even another country. The further they are from home territors, the less likely it is that the relationship will be accidentally exposed.

If the spy cannot travel to a distant place or a foreign country, then the case officer will have to identify a secure place where the meeting can be IEEE closer to home. In low-threat attoutions, the case officer may decide to meet in some public place, say a park or restaurant. However, if the session will include training or last a long sums, the case officer will want to arrange for a safe house.

Safe Houses

A safe house is any private place controlled by the case officer or his agents, which this not been identified by nor counterespionage or security agency if may be a rental house on a large piece of property or an apartment. But it works becter if the apartment is nor in a building that has a doorman as a security system. Hotel manus can also be used in a safe house. When the room is rented just before a roccting in scheduled. The man officer can be teasonably certain that the room is secure, especially if he or one of his agents picks up the spy at another spot and takes him to the hotel.

It at always best if the recent doesn't know prior to the meeting where the safe house is. He should be picked in another site and taken to the safe house. If the case officer interior to continue to sum the safe house, the spy should he blindfolded or perhaps travel in the house of a truck or sum to be can't up the route of travel.

Whenever the case officer more one ill his spies, the case recruit. Someone working for the case officer should keep the recruit. Someone working for the case officer should keep the recruit under surveillance from the time be departs for the meeting until ofter be has returned to his home in place of business. If the mini officer of his agents spot anyone surveilling the recruit, the meeting site, in the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting inust be aborted and the mini officer should leave the meeting in minimum of the minimum of

If the meeting includes a training session of a trip to a foreign country, the spy must have a good cover study to explain his absence to his employer and family. Although it may never be used, we cover story should include innotest explanations for the spy's actions at every point during the trip, from his house of office to the location of the meeting.

The best cover stones are those that include several differences of deception. In one example, a Colombian drug ring recruited an informant inside the Coast Goard office responsible for drug interdiction on the high seas. The drug earliest officer wanted three days with the informant, a young flight heutenant, in train him in the use of a sophisticated computer communication system that the lateral of a software of a software computer that offered a week's vacation in Canton. Mexico.

The lieutenant entered and wan the rigged context and rook the cop. After he checked into a hotel in Cancum, he met a pretty Argentinean amount at the hotel but in what would have appeared in the surveillance of he a casual pickup. The Argentine was an expensive international prostitute who had been hired by the drug castel but who had no idea she was working the drug traffickers. She eatried a scaled envelope of instructions that she gave to the Coast Guard officer as soon as they were alone in a hotel man.

After spending the night with the woman, the lieutenant called his office back home and told his secretary that he was taking a sea excursion to visit the ruins in the Yucatan

Peninsula for the day, He then rented a man and asked for a map of the Youatan before driving away with the Latin American woman by his side.

Following the districtions, they drave to a Meyican town on the river across from Belize. The two checked into the best hotel section. The honorman then deliberately disabled the rental car and left it in a local repair shop to be fixed. A van pucked him up as he walked back to the hotel and rook him to a ranch several miles outside of town and on the Belize side of the river where the heutenant spent two days in maining. The Aigentinean woman staved in the hotel room in town, ordering from service for two and keeping the "The Not Desturb" sign living on the door (The cartel supplied another woman, one who apolic no English, for the lieutenant's pleasure during his two nights at the ranch.)

When the lieuteeant finally returned to his hotel in Cancun, he calted his secretary and described an unfortuning many of his car breaking down and his spending uncomfortable nights in a small Mexican nown. Notace ever obcoked his story, but if someone had, that person would have discovered the heatenant's secret sexual excapade, but majeculence that he had exert entered fields from Mexican.

Case Studies

he following studies demonstrate the different recharques and plots that can be used to assume a spy. Readers should saw themselves how they would have created the scenario, what stage decorations they would have used, how they would have approached the target for recruitment, and how they would have led the target into treason.

CATCHING QADDAFI'S FLUNKY

In 1980, Khalid Al-Daraji, a Libyan munitions capert, was working up the Libyan are defense program. His duties sometimes required stays of several weeks in Rome as part of the Libyan effort to buy high-tech air defense weapons from European farms willing in trade technology for petro-dollars. Khalid always left his wife and family in Libya when making such trips. The CIA identified Khalid as a pessible tecrnic who might IIII it something about Libyan air defenses. CIA intelligence officers working undercover in the U.S. Embassy in Rome designed and implemented a plan to entrap Khalid the next time he showed up in Rome.

As was his costum, on his next trip to Rome Khalid stayed in a small hotel apartment and mok the bus each day to his office in the Libyan Embassy. As he was waiting one morning in the bus stop, a young Italian woman walked an and stood waiting beside him. She smiled at him, but neither spoke. A few minutes later, a large section pulled up in the nearly driven by a middle-aged man dressed in a business sun; the woman gut into the ear, and off they drove.

For the most three days. Khalid found the woman watting for her ride when he arrived at the bas stop. She was always the only other person standing there. While she always smiled at him, and a couple of times said good morning, the shy Khalid never tried to start a conversation. Each day the man in the un came by and picked her up.

On the least day, the me didn't show up at the usual time. The woman didn't look worned about the failure of her ride to appear, and about five minutes later she boarded a bus that always passed the stop just a few minutes before Khalid's bus came by:

Less than 30 seconds after the bus had pulled away, the man in the impolled up to the stop. He rolled his window nown and asked Khalid if he had seen the woman hid usually picked up, khalid answered that his woman had just taken a bus. The man thanked Khalid, and then, in what appeared to be an afterthought, asked Khalid where he was going. When Khalid told him, the man said he was going that way and offered Khalid a ride into the eny center, which he accepted.

The driver of the car, who spoke English with a British publie whool accent, introduced himself as Marthew Clark He explained that the woman, Eva, and he worked as the same building. He give her a side whenever it was convenient.

For the next several days, when Clark stopped to pick the Eva. he also offered Khalid a ride. As they code along, Matthew directed the conversation mostly at Khalid, asking him about North Africa and Libyan culture. Matthew also talked a fittle about himself and his business, which was putting together international trade deals for a German trade consortium. By the third day he was asking Khalid questions about the Libyan economy and the possibilities for trade apportunities in Libya.

When the conversation drifted into a discussion of testauseem on the fourth day, Marthew asked Khalid's recommendation for a good North African restaurant. When Khalid replied that he almost never are in restaurants, Matthew insisted that Khalid go in dinner with him that evening, Kholid accepted the invitation but suggested he would prefer to try a good French restaurant. Marthew took the suggestion as evidence that while Khalid was enjoying his new friendship, he did not want to risk running into anyone from the Librar Embassy while as the company of a European. Matthew then asked Evo to join them as he planned in tak-Martha (It was the first time that Marthew had menmined he had a women in his life.) At dinner, Metthew manduced Marths as a business associate, although they acted more than lovery Khalid found Eva a very friendly dinner pastner, who was obviously interested in him as a man,

Thus began a four-way friendship that quickly became an important part of Khahd's Roman experience, but must be never mentioned to his Libyan colleagues at the ombassy, khalid especially wanted to keep his romance with five, which had blossomed during the first dinner engagement, a ret from his Libyan computriots. That very night. Eva had histed Khalid to her own apartment, just down the block in Khalid's apartment, and made love to him. After that, health and five frequently went out to dinner with Matthew and Martha, with Matthew always picking up the check.

Increasingly, Marrhew focused the conversation when they were rogether on possible trade opportunities for his firm a Libya. When Khalid talked enthusiastically about several inferent possibilities for trade, Matthew asked if Khalid tould put usual of his thoughts down on paper, promising to say Khalid if the report proved useful in discovering possible Libyan cade opportunities.

Khalid prepared such a report, which contained nothing of a sensitive nature. Matthew praised the information and a day later passed. Khalid in covelope stuffed with Italian bank notes, which he claimed was payment from his partners. Khalid used most of the money in buy an expensive present for Eva, who was now sleeping at his apartment almost every night. Khalid, whose circumcised wife back in Iran found was a painful experience that she endured as seldom as possible, was getting the best sex of his life and doing a lor of pillow-talk bragging about the important work he was doing for his country.

On two more maximum Matthew asked Kholid in write reports on economic and political developments in Libral paving him well for each effort. The next time that Matthew asked for a report, he requested that Kholid jox down specific comments on Qaddaff's political future and the possibility of his averthrow.

Khalid's first attempt quinted the official Libyan line, saving only the minum things possible about Quidafi. Matthew rejected that arrenage and refused in pay for it, insisting that Khalid write the truth as he know at not Libyan propaganda. At the same time, Evo was suggesting that she and Khalid fly to a Mediterranean return los a weekend getaway, in expense that Khalid had no way in pay for unless he could collect another payment from Matthew.

After a couple of days. Khalid gave Manihew a report on Quddoff that criticized the dictator and described a number of attenties the knew Qaddoff had committed. Even so, the report predicted that Qaddoff had a permanent hold on power and that he would probably rule until the day he died of old age. Khalid begged Matthew not in divolge to anyone who had prepared the seport, and Matthew promised that Khalid had nothing so worky about Matthew paid Khalid enough in splange in a big way on his weekend with Eva

The next time Matthew asked Khalid for more information, he asked for information on the Libvan nit defense says tem, explaining that his trade constraints hoped to outbid the current suppliers for the Libyan government purchases. Matthew assured Khalid that he would be serving Libya's best interests because Matthew's consortium would be able to supply better, more modern equipment in a baggain price. However, in order to make an offer that would impress Khalid's busses in the Libyan government. Matthew needed details on what hand of equipment test Labyans had already purchased, who its supplied the equipment, how much they had paid for the equipment, and how the equipment was positioned to defend Dipoli and Benghazi.

Manhew promised Khalid that if his information made a deal prescribe, he would make Khalid a secret partner and Khalid might well make a bundred thousand British pounds or more. Matthew suggested that in anticipation of such wealth. Khalid ought to open a socret Swiss bank occount and give a bit of advice on how Khalid could do that.

Both Eva and Marcha lettened at Marchew made his proposal. As soon as she and Khaild were alone, Eva began talking excitedly about the expected money, and that night, Khaild experienced the best are must in the morning. Eva suggested that if Khaild earned the expected money, his might set her up in an apartment in Tripoli as a permanent part of his life.

Khalid had to rewrite the report on Libyan air defences several troses, each time adding more detail at Manhaw's insistence. In the time the report mer Marthew's demands, Khalid must have realized that he was selling his nation's closely guarded secrets. He no doubt continued in tell himself, however, that he must selling those secrets to people who would never use them against Libya.

In fact, the information provided by Khallil played a key role in the planning for the U.S. sit setuck on Tripoli on April 14, 1986.

Matthew Clark was a CIA case officer working under a false flag. He was backed up by a team of a dozen agenta.

Martha was a CIA expert on air defenses assigned in the case on provide technical advice to the CiA man officer. Eva was a very expensive Italian prostitute who had no more idea of the true identity of Marthew than Khalid Ta. The original plan was that Khalid would take the little at the bus stop and man flitting with Eva, which is turn would lead to a date and then sex, after which she would introduce him in Marthew. When the shy Khalid didn't take Ta bair, Marthew changed the plan and made the approach by offering Khalid a nde. From there, thangs went according to plan.

WHO'S THE SPY?

Lester Staplet are caught up in what is perhaps and main convoluted spy management involving a false flag ever pot at place. Staplet had been employed as a civilian intelligence analyst to: the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) for seven years. Then he left the agency and started his own private international constitute firm.

Working under contract with a U.S unline company. Staplet went to Mexico City on an extended arrange way. While there, he was approached by George Brennan and Kenneth Brauer. But Identified themselves as CIA intelligence officers arrange to the U.S. Embass in Mexico City. They said they are about his previous employment with the DIA and asked him for assistance in setting up a man as penetrate the KGB operation in Mexico, telling him he would be serving his country while making tome good money. They explained they wanted Staplet to pretend to be a financially strapped U.S. businessman who wanted to cush in on things he knew about the DIA by selling information to the local KGB resident.

The two CIA agents assured Stapler that he would be working as a contract employee of the CIA while performing the service. He was given a civil service application form to fill out, W-2 forms, and applications for management death benefits, as well as the standard security clearance update forms.

Stressing that a majorithm of the properties of the Soviet resident that he had information worth selling. George and Ken told Suspler to give the Soviet agent a lot an detail about his work at the DIA. When Stapler expressed some hesitation in doing that, fearing he might let slip some settets, the three men spent several days in a hotel going over what Staplet could tell the Soviet agent about his previous employment and what he shouldn't mention.

During those long sessions, the two CIA men had Stapler describe in detail what he did during his seven-year career at the DIA. They drafted several dozen different messages to the CIA headquarters asking for specific clearance for what things Stapler could release and what things he should not mention.

The two CLA men also gave Supler a direct phone numtion at the embassy where he could contact them. Scapler called the number several times. The phone was always inswered by a female secretary speaking American-scyle English with a stight Mexican accent and tolling the caller he had reached the U.E. Embassy

During the long sessions in hotel rooms, the two intelligence officers frequently talked on the telephone with sometime at the embassy while Stapler histored to their side of the conversation. They also showed Stapler the answers to the messages they had sent to Washington.

The three ment eventually developed a playbook of specific things that Stapler could tell the Sovier case agent once contact had been made. The final script ended up being in bland that Stapler expressed some concern that it wouldn't be enough to satisfy the Soviet officer. Nevertheless, the two UIA men insisted that once contact in been made, Stapler would not give the Soviet agent anything be wasn't authorized by Washington to give.

When the sum CIA agents were satisfied that Stapler at teady, they directed him to make contact with the Soviet agent, pretending to be a walk-in. Stapler walked into the Soviet Embassy in Mexico and gave the story about wanting in sell secrets. He was soon talking as in around who called himself Boris. Stapler followed the script approved by the CIA headquarters and reported back to Brennan and Braver after the meeting. The two CIA agents were cestatic, telling Stapler that he had met with Boris Komplektov, one of the top KGB case officers in Mexico.

Stapler met several more umes with Boria, who insisted with increasing agitation that Stapler provide more sensitive information as proof of his sincerety. Boria' demands for more detailed information resulted in more long discussions with the two CIA men over what Stapler might tell the Soviet agent. The sum CIA men durited more cubies and a day later showed Stapler the replies, which denied permission in give any more sensitive information to the Soviet intelligence. If it is then what Langley had already approved

Stapler met once more with Hous, who abruptly reminated the conventation and told Stapler that the information he was trying to peddle may worthless. When Stapler reported back to George and Kenneth, they thanked Stapler for his conperation, agreeing with Stapler that the play hadn't worked because of the CIA's unwillingness to throw most touth into the equation.

The two CIA men did insist that 30 had not been lists they had at least learned a few things about 50% its NGB handled a walk-in. They stressed 102 importance of keeping the whole thing secret and showed Stapler a request they were submitting for a substantial bonus for Stapler's samuely. They promised Stapler that the U.S. Treasury Department would make a check, which would be maifed as his U.S. bank account. Stapler's next bank statement showed the money had been deposited as promised.

This might have ended the whole affair, except that several weeks later when he was back home in the States. Stapler read a news article reporting that the H.S. Embassy in Mexico City had an office of RM FBI that monitored Americans seen entering the Soviet Embassy, which was suspected of being a favorise spot for would-be spies to make contact with Soviet attelligence officers.

Based on his own experience working in the U.S. intelligence community, Stapler was only too aware of how interagency competition are admirate keps the right hand from learning that the left men doing. Increasingly concerned that the FBI might have seen him talking to the Soviet agent and that the CIA may not have bothered in tell the FBI about its little attempt to entrap a KGB officer, Stapler tried to contact George Brennan and Konneth Brauer, using an embassy number they had given him.

A recording in Spanish told him that number was no longer in service. Stapler found the listed number for the U.S. Embassy, called it, and was told no one by those names was an or ever the worked in the embassy. Staplet then decided to the FBI, describe what had happened, and make the wash than some IEE list of potential spress.

He immediately found himself accused of spying, hased the interview with the FBI in which he admitted having met with Boris in Mexico City. The FBI did have a record of his visits with Boris, and the FBI agents assumed that Stapler. Loving realized that the FBI must have been watching, and twing to divert suspiction by claiming he was working for the CIA. The FBI missted that they had checked with the CIA, which defined having any employees named George Brennan and Kenneth Braver.

It took several years for the case to work through the court system. The CIA insisted in response to court summonses that they had an employees by the name of George Brennan and Kenneth Brauer, and did they have any record that Lester Stapter had every performed any service for the CIA while in Mexico City R belated check with Stapler's bank uncovered that the payment III had received had been a cashier's check frawn as a Mexican bank and the source could not be traced.

White the FBI remains convinced that Stapler was a walkin whom the KGB rejected, others in the intelligence game have concluded that Stapler not the victim of a very elever false-flag setup.

The same Stapler knew as George Brennan and Kenneth Brauer may have been Sovier intelligence case officers, or they could have been case officers working for any of a dozen other intelligence services. They could have even been spying for one of the several different antigovernment groups that are constantly criticizing U.S. intelligence agencies.

Whoever they were, they built no doubt targeted Stapler with the minute of learning everything he might tell them about his work with the DIA. When they discovered he was going to Mexico City on a business trip, they may it as the perfect opportunity. Thing false ID, they had set up an office where they could produce what looked in Stapler had official embassy telegrams. The supposed embassy telegrams. The supposed embassy they gave Stapler was a front manned by some woman who had probably never been min the real H.S. Embassy. The long sessions in which Stapler thought his and he two CIA had dlers were determining what he could and couldn't tell a Soviet intelligence agent about his previous harm were really opportunities for the two fake CIA may officers to learn just about everything about DIA analysts that they could.

WHY RECRUIT A HOTEL MAID?

Sometimes access agents van in a important as a primary agent inight be in other circumstances. Charlene firevis was the night housekeeper for a commercial hotel in a grain midwest-circ circ. Charlene was also a single mother who first three teenaged children. When her only use died as an automat nurism in a drug shoot-out. Charlene joined a patents' organization that was campaigning for soicces enforcement of drug laws.

About six months later, a man named Ray Kelleher started attending the meetings and introduced himself to Charlene. After a couple more meetings, Ray focused the kind of attention on Charlene that suggested a possible romance. Ray didn't talk much about himself but did listen sympatherically as Charlene talked about her dead sun and her hopes for college educations for her two daughters.

The hight they become lovers, Ray told Charlene that he was an undercover agent for the state police narcutics squad but asked her to keep that information confidential. As their tomance blossomed, Ray often talked about the frustrations of an job and how difficult it was to get evidence on kingpin drug dealers. He confided that he and his colleagues had learned that several big drug dealers often checked into the hotel where Charlene worked. Ray and certain that the dealers were discussing major deals as their hotel rooms. Ray suggested that if there was only some way to sneak into the rooms where the drug dealers staved, he might be able to find evidence as plant a microphone to gather such evidence. Unfortunately, without doing that, he couldn't even gather enough evidence as ask for a legal search of phone tap warrant.

Because of Charlene's anger about drug dealers, Ray didn't have too much trouble convincing and during the next several weeks that she could do a real service for the war makes if she would provide Ray with pass keys, which would allow him season to has foom in the hotel that he suspected was being used by drug dealers.

Although Ray warned Chorlene that she must keep her selp a secret, he also told her he had alranged with his superiors to list Charlene as a confidential informant and she would Hi well paid for her assistance. Charlene began founing has set of pass keys almost every night, and she also started putting substantial amounts of money into a special hank stantage that would eventually help ensure her man daughters got a chance in go to college.

Several weeks later. Ray showed Charlene a newspaper man reporting the amount of a major group ill Colombian drug maffickers engaged in a money-laundering scheme. Ray fairned the mass was the direct result of information he had collected from the hotel form where one of the conspirators had stayed. After that, Ray continued to point our occasional news stories of big drug busts, which he claimed had resulted from Charlene's cooperation.

Ray Kellober's real name was Steven Kissman, and he was not a police officer. In fact, he had a police record as a confidence man. The only thing he knew about the drug cases he claimed to have helped solve and what M read in the papers. He and several other colleagues had found a non-profession to industrial and commercial intelligence. What he really was after was access to the notebook computers as more histness executives carry with them whenever they travel.

Ray would use the pass keys Charlene provided to enter the hotel rooms of business travelers while they were dining, taking in the city's entertainment, or even sleeping in their hotel rooms in the early morning hours. Hay carried his own notabook computer along in his forsys, which he would use to download the summer of any notabook computer he located or a guest's bedroom. On those occasions when the hismessman was sleeping in his said. Ray would take the computer out of the mone to su coupty man where he would cruise through the files and download key and hefore returning the computer to the owner's man. Ray and his colleagues would then go over the field, identifying information that could be fill to foreign competitors of the U.S. business corporations.

Eventually. Ray's luck ran mu, one of his victims woke up while he had her computer in another room. Finding that she couldn't go back to sleep, the woman decided to fill some work and discovered that her computer and missing. The city police investigated the theft, and Charlene's company spent significant amounts of money on private detectives but were unable to recover the computer or discover who last taken it.

Charlene, however, immediately figured out who must have stolen the computer. When she confronted Ray, is admitted that he had taken it but pointed out that if he were caught, she would go down with him. The strable into secount Charlene (and accumulated would convince any jury that she was part of the gang.

Charlene still works for Ray, but no longer shares her hed with the lover turned blackmailer. He still pays her for her services, but not nearly as much at when she thought she working with the nates. She is sun the only horel employee in the city working for Ray and his partners. In each case, the ream used a different scheme in recruiting someone who could give them access to the mains of his incismen traveling with notehook computers filled with data.

CATCH A MAN WHEN HE'S DOWN

Wilber H Schutt worked as an engineer for Eden Electronics Production, a large government weapons contractor Schott, whose work involved the design of such high-tech weapons-guidance systems as those demonstrated during the Gulf War, had a top-secret US government security clearance. After 20 years on the job, Schott failed to get an promotion he had expected, mainly because his personal life was falling apart and impacting his work performance.

In his early 50s, Schott soun found himself newly divorced with financial troubles that forced him to file personal bank-topicy. Reduced to living in a rented efficiency apartment while the worked at a job with lattle hope of promotion, his july managed was an occasional game of tenous played on the apartment complex's tenous court. It was there to met letty Kwasniewski, a Polish businessman. Kwasniewski played at abnot the same level as Schott, although Schott regularly wan about two out of three games.

After a couple of weeks, Schott invited Kwasniewski up to his apartment after a game for a couple of beers. From there, their relationship developed into a friendship with lots of technical Rule about developments in electronics and the efforts of Poland to find potential customers for some of the new produced Polash industry was manufacturing. When Kwasniewski asked Schott as write down a list of possible U.S. research to whom Kwasniewski might try to sell. Wilber sgreed as do m.

A couple of weeks later. Kwasniewski knocked mi Schott's door and excitedly approunced that the University Schutt provided had resulted in a substantial sale Kwasniewski then insisted on paying Schott a finder's sim for the information that had made the sale possible.

School had been trained as part of his employment at maugnize hospic intelligence acuvity. He chose at increase the obvious signuls and happily accepted the cash puvinent. which he spent as back tent and a couple of much-needed new mans. Over the next several months, Kwasmewski paid Schotz from its similar kinds ari inconsequential information. and reports on six different occasions. Each time the fees increased in size. Initially, Schott gaed the money as pay for necessities, but eventually at the a bit left over to pay an buxunes, including a return to less dating appear

Shorrly after Schott began settonsly during a woman with two young children. Kwasniewski taked to see some unclassifield but sensitive material and radar fire control for tanks to which Schott had access. Classnang he wanted the information so he could advise his home office on possible areas in which it should direct research projects, Kwasniewski promised a substantial payment as a consulting fee for good information

Schott thought it over for a few days, then copied the material from company files and passed the information on to-Kwasniewski. The payment he eathed mus enough to allow Schott to buy a small engagement mag and propose marriage to the new woman in his life.

From that point, it was an easy task for Kwasniewski to ask for confidential and eventually secret information. Schott knew what he man doing but kept telling himself that as soon as he got set financially, he would cut the telation with Kwasniewski, who was already talking about an expected transfer back as his home office or Poland. a transfer that Schott assumed would end the relationship

When Kwasniewski alli ger the promised transfer, he proposed that he give Schott and his new wife a belated honeymore trip in Innsbruck, Austria, in appreciation for the great help that Schott and given him during his stay in the United States. In Innabruck, Kwasmewski spent three days showing Schotz and We wife the townst sites.

On the fourth day, Kwasniewski invited Schott to a final tennis game at a local club while Schott's wife went shopping. While they were playing on a private coutt, a man whom Kwasniewski introduced at the person who would be replacing Jum as Schott's contact appeared. When Schott discovered that Kwasniewski expected that he would continue to turn .... classified information as weapons systems to the new control. School anguly inspired that IP had no meaning of doing to

At that point, was control officer, who had none of Kwasmewski's subilety, pulled our of his pocket an envelope and spread use a collection of pictures showing Schott's new stepchildren. The first pretures had been taken as the chilwalked away from the home of a neighbor where they were staying while their mother and new stepfather enjoyed sights of Austria. The series of pictures followed the teenaged children as school and as some extracutricular activmey after school.

The new control officer then grimly announced that not only was Schott going to continue providing information, but that he mis going to spend the last two days of his lunsbrock vacation undergoing some intensive training to make him a more useful gag. The new control officer suggested that Schote suddenly suffer a flu arrack. Kwasniewski would then take wife on some while Schott stayed in the hotel from and "nursed his flu" while the training took place.

As the end of the training amount the new control officer rewarded Schott with a $7,000 payment for his good behavior just before the Schotts boarded the plane to return home. He also provided Schott with detailed requests for specific information be wanted, as well as instructions for how to pass such information on through. Schott continued to pass information to the Polish inselligence service for several years. He was paid well for the information BE provided, but he may spying more out of feat than greed.

Schott fit all the classic profile characteristics of a highly recruitable spy: marital problems that ended in divorce, financial problems, job dissatisfaction, me open friendship with a Soviet bloc national—all followed by sudden, unexplained wealth and frequent foreign travel. (He, his wife, and sometimes the two teenagers made several more trips to language over the next few mars.) But no U.S. spy-eatcher uncarried him. A Polish defector eventually turned Schott in.

KNOCK HIM DOWN AND PICK HIM UP

After 15 years with the DEA. Wavne Kramer considered himself to be a hard-charging animal agent as 100 promotion fast track. Assigned to a special money-laundering task force in South Florida, Wayne was tasked with dealing with a number of state law enforcement officials in well as several high-ranking executives in the banking community who were cooperating with law enforcement in spot money faundering operations.

In his spare time. Wavne and his wife were also active in a church group engaged in drug-education activities 200000 as high school students. While working with the church group. Wayne was Robert Shanklin, who had recently moved to Florida after retiring from a job as a deputy prosecuting attorney in a northern state. Despite the differences in their ages, the man men developed a motual friendship because of Shanklin's strong advocacy of federal drug-enforcement programs.

During one of their conversations. Wavne confided in the older Shanklin that he was expecting to be promoted to the position of task force director when the current director got his expected promotion to the DEA's Washington headquarters.

A month before the expected promotion are to be announced, a Florida State Police agency discovered evidence while investigating man of their cases that implicated Wayne Kramer as a money-laundering scheme. Kramer angrily proclaimed his innocence, but the investigation into the charges took several months, during which tune Kramer was placed on administrative leave. Another officer got the promonou that Kramer thought would be his.

The federal investigation failed to find enough evidence to was Kramer, and he was eventually returned to full dury with no toss if pay. Kramer and his wife, however, had to take out a second mortgage on their home to pay for the legal services Kramer employed to help prove his innocence.

As men often the case in such situations, upon his return see duty. Kramer found that many of his colleagues still thought the was guilty. Although he still had a job on the task force. Kramer non working for a supervisor he considered incompetent. Worse, he knew he would make get another promotion. The only makes he stock it out was because he would be eligible for early retirement in seven years.

Through the hard times, the one friend who stuck with Kramer was Robert Shanklin. Shanklin not that intered that the behaved Kramer to be innocent, he loaned Kramer money for legal fees and helped him find the attorney who eventually up the charges dropped.

Shortly after Kramer returned as duty, Shanklin suggested and the person who had tried to frame Wayne was probably a realous colleague who that sold out to the drug lords. Shanklin proposed that he (Shanklin) begin his own private investigation, using his considerable experience as a prosecutor to find out what happened.

At Shanklin's suggestion, the two men statted examining every one of Kramer's colleagues who had worked on the task force prior to the discovery of the evidence that seemed to implicate Kramer in a drug deal. Shanklin assured Kramer that if they kept digging in each person's caselnad, they would eventually discover something that didn't match upperhaps a sure case that suddenly fell apart, an investigation that turned suur. or even some evidence of unexplained weslth by a colleague.

Kramer knew that he was sharing with Shanklin a great deal of information on DEA personnel, ongoing investigation, and even the identity of confidential informants, for Kramer was so determined to discover who had framed that the felt justified in accepting Shanklin's help and providing him all information needed for the investigation.

After several months of such activity. Shanklin told Kranter that he was increasingly convinced that the colleague who had gotten the promotion Kramer had lost was a dirty cop who had deliberately framed Kramer so the could cover the own cracks as well as get the promotion. Shanklin suggested that the dirty cop was now using his position as the director of the cash force to protect the crooks who paid him off while taking the competition out of circulation.

Kramer did not immediately go at the superiors with Shanklin's evidence, instead Shanklin and he started planning how this would each the new task force director with the hand in the till Looking for a scheme that would trap the suspected dirty cop. Kramer shared even more confidential information as active cases, hoping to spot a case where the dury colleague had ripped off one of the drug dealers of a pending attest

Suddenly, in a single week, several of the task force's major cases went some. Three prime witnesses, including a high-ranking bank officer, were guinned down in gang-aryle killings, five suspects targeted for arrest suddenly left the country, and when the rask force served a search warrant that was supposed in eatch major evidence based on wiretap information, they found nothing.

Every agent as the task force suddenly found himself poswering rough questions in an impervisors tried to identify the source of a major information leak. Wayne, assuming that somehow his "crooked" supervisor had discovered the plan that Shanklin and he were about to put into play, tried in the fact Shanklin to discuss what they could do next. Shanklin didn't make his phone, and when Kramer checked out the condo where he lived. In one answered the door.

Badly shaken, Wayne found himself once again a primary suspect to the investigation. When Wayne failed a lie-detection test question about whether he had ever revealed confidential information to an anauthorized source, he tried to explain to one of the DEA's internal affairs investigators exactly what Shanklin and he had been doing. A subsequent investigation discovered that there was no such persun in Robert Shanklin and retrainly no evidence that the new rask force supervisor had been dealing with curningly.

The investigators eventually concluded that Robert Shanklin was working with a major Colombian drug grafficking around which had deliberately set out to infiltrate the DEA money-laundering task force. Shanklin, or someone with whom he was working had probably planted the eviness that cost Wayne Kramer his promotion—probably because at that time Kramer and those under his supervision were all found to an incorruptible. Then Shanklin—who already had Kramer convinced of the false identity—moved to pretending in be the friend in need.

Shankho's skill in pretending to the a retired prosecutor suggests that he may well have worked as a prosecutor at some time under another identity. He fills likely been recipited by the drug extrel at that point and had continued to work for them after retirement.

Shanklin didn't share the information he tricked out of Kramer with everyone, only with a select group of traffickets and usual launderers who worked for one segment of the Uali Cartel. (The rask furve still gas a number of convictions.) In effect, the cartel got a double bonus: they escaped prosecution and put the competition out of business and in the can.

Kramer's supervisor decided that rather than go public with what Kramer that done and prosecute him for leaking confidential information, the task force would take the credit for the drug dealers and money launderers they did careh and not tell anyone about the bigger fish that got many because a clever drug cartel intelligence agent first knocked Kramer down and then picked him up.

Kramer was even permitted to stay on with the agency, although he was transferred to a small office along the California/Mexico border. Six must after his transfer, Kramer was killed while working undercover in a hou-bust investigation.

Conclusion

The Successful Spy

I will never read about successful spies in the newspaper or watch them being interviewed on TV talk shows. Only failure makes a spy famous. Success guarantees that the public will never know the spy's name—and neither will the victims who suffered the results of his efforts.

Around the world, every day, thousands of meet and women go to work planning to steal the most valued thing with which they are entrusted: the secrets of their employant, fellow citizens, and friends. Their victims often believe these traitors to be exemplary employees, loyal confederates, and faithful friends. Most of the time, the traitors will spy for years, even decades, without ever being discovered or even suspected.

The vast majority of those who become successful spies never planned or expected to become traitors. They took the jobs that positioned them so that they had access to valuable secrets, expecting to work their careers out as loyal and honest employees. Many will even deny the accusation of tresson, insisting that they were forted to take the only course of action possible because others betrayed them, took advantage of them, or denied them a fair shake in life. Even those who admit that they have turned traitor will offer complicated excuses for why their actions are justified.

The case officers who turned them imm traitors knew how to help them find that justification. Behind every successful spy in a successful intelligence case officer who deliberately conned the person into becoming a spy. Good man officers means see their names in the newspaper either.

Yet, the key in spying uniners is that the spy or the time officer who recruits the spy. In the final analysis, every increaseful spy owes has success to the person many whom he is appling. Just the thieves thrive when people are careless with how they protect their valuables, so, uni, do spies thrive when people are careless with the way they protect their secrets.

Most readers will never have any reason to recruit a spy. Intelligent, strong, self-reliant, courageous, and competent people don't have as steal secrets to survive and prosper while defending themselves from aggressors. If you have an enemy on the border, the way to make sure he never attacks is into misteal his plan of attack. Instead, you must arm and prepare to defeat any attack that the aggressor might bounch and then let him know exactly how strong you are. If you don't prepare that kind of defense, then stealing every one of your enemy's secrets won't save you from disaster.

If a business competitor is outperforming you, the answer is not to steal his secrets; it's to better terms your customers and keep them coming back. If you want to beat a political opponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, the answer is not waging dirty tricks, lying topoponent, it's taking a logical stance on issues, offering simple explanations, good advertising, and the courage to be honest with the voters. If you have a personal relationship with a lover or a partner that has degenerated to the point that just must spy on that person—or worse, you fear that he may be spying on you—it ism already failed and the best thing you can do is end it as quickly as possible.

The paradox is that the more comperent, elever, and me-cessful you become in business, social relations, government, politics, or your personal life, the more likely it is that someone will set use to steal plan secrets of success and use that information to destroy you. If you are really good at what you do, your enemy will me succeed in defeating you, even if he succeeds in stealing your secrets. More likely, pur won't have any secrets worth stealing. The strongest, most successful people in the world live their lives as open books, exting not a whit about keeping secrets. Indeed, they want the world to know how strong they are.

However, many of you are not have that strength of character, and you do have secrets you think you need to keep. If your enemies meeted in learning what you want to keep hidden from the world, their successful spying will cost you money, pain, worry, frustration, and even defeat. It is for you that this book is really written. The more you know about how spies are recruited, the better prepared you will be to recognize the spies within your own ranks and neutralize them or error turn them arrived the people who recruited them.

The person who successfully spies on you will not be some funny-looking stranger or someone who openly challenges your authority or makes his dislike for you obvious. The person who spies on you will be someone you trust. It may be your secretary, your most faithful employee, your good friend, as even your lover.

If you have a traitor in your midst, the thing you must understand is that something went wrong long before the spy master came along and convinced that person to betray man. Good case officers must have human material to work with. The best must to protect against the spy is to make sure that the only people who have access to your secrets are people who have as much to make beging those secrets as you do.

Whether you are running a country, a business, a criminal caterorise, or a political movement, or just fiving well on your own hard work, here are a few things you can do to make someone you trust doesn't listen to the siren call of manual.

- Never accept people based on what they, or others, say they are. Find out what they have done. Whether put are hiring an employee, accepting volunteer help in a political action group, or starting a friendship or a love affair, thoroughly check out the background of everyone you must bust. The things that count are not letters of recommendation, the praises of peers, or the fawning adulation if their friends, but credit records, school records, enurt and criminal records (or, better said, the lack of such records), and past successes or failures in sports, business, employment, said personal living.
- Past behavior is no guarantee of future behavior. No united how sterling someone's background or past work performance, watch for evidence that doesn't track with what you already know. Decide based on what people do today, not what they did yesterday, and certainly never what they say they will do tomorrow.
- Do not rely a quick fixes such as polygraph examinations, scheduled security clearance updates, surprise audits, surveillance camerus, an electronic envestrapping as a means of revealing spies.
- Be security countions and educate those you trust on best intelligence case officers recruit tries. Offer substantial sewards for anyone who reports a possible approach to an enemy espionage officer.
- Don't identify your own counteresponder officers. (You don't have a counterespionage officers if you keep valuable secrets, you want someone on the payroll whose job it is as guard those secrets.) Don't put those charged with transcerespionage in the security office that have after the physical and personal security of the building and the employees. Counterespionage officers about work under cover in personnel officers, special assistants, legal aids, morale officers, or any other title that allows them in move easily among your employees and gather information without anyone suspecting what they are really doing.

- Learn on much about your employees who have access to your secrets as any except case officer could learn. Your counterespionage officers should look at every employee with access to accept on a regular (but random) basis by using the same techniques that a recruiting case officer would that means secret surveillance that neither the employee may anyone except you and the counterespionage officer transpire is going on (Sure, that's expensive, but if the CIA had been doing that instead of trusting in he detectors, Rick Ames would have been caught in the first year he started spending the main money he carned by spying for the KGB.)
- Don't keep things secret that don't have to be kept secret. Know what is vital intelligence that must be protected and restrict access to such information only to those who need to know.
- Develop sound personnel practices that reward effort, creativity, and localty. Make sure they reach down to the little people who are such an attractive rarget for apy recruiters. Anyone with access to secret material or areas where secret mannial is held should be paid extra money for the trust you have in them. Secretaries who type up secret documents should make as much as college-educated company executives and should be treated with the same respect.
- Don't keep diagrantical employees on the payroll, especially employees who feel they haven't been treated fairly. If you can't promote the man who thinks he deserves a promotion, fire him. Don't leave him in place.
- Don't keep any employee in a position that gives him access to the state of the develops any vives at habits such as alcohol or drag advant, credit problems, dangerous or offensive sexual behavior, or personality disorders. (This thies in the face of the modern idea of vice as a disease, but tolerance for bad behavior in one of the printary reasons why American intelligence agencies loss the spy war.)
- · Be tolerant of unusual or different behavior that does not impact on job performance or the employee's personal relations. Don't fire the open homosexual who lives quietly with a partner. Do fire the married man who theats on his wife every chance he gets, lies as her and his colleagues about what he is doing, and uses the work as a cover to get many with it.

Of course, following these tales will mu guarantee that no one will ever steal your secrets. But real life has ma guarantees—something that every good man officer knows. He takes the human material he finds, and he manipulates it into something he can use. You can do the same, whether must are trying to recruit a spy or make sure your employees, friends, and lovers must faithful to you.
